The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the message.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the message, with the accompanying papers, be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and be printed. I desire to say that I suppose every member of the Senate heartily joins in congratulation over a hopeful honorable settlement to both parties of an unpleasant difference that has arisen between two sister Republics.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate that the communication from Mr. Egan to the Secretary of State be read. It is not long.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the communication from the minister of the United States at Chile will be read.

The Chief Clerk read Mr. Egan's dispatch, which appears in the House proceedings.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The message, with the accompanying papers, will be printed and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. CULLOM, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1681) making an appropriation for the construction of two United States revenue cutters for service on the Great Lakes, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. COCKRELL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 692) authorizing the Secretary of War to procure and present suitable medals to the survivors of the "forlorn-hope storming party" of Port Hudson, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 422) granting an honorable discharge to Harlow Brewer, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. COKE, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1295) to authorize the construction of jetties, piers, and breakwaters at private expense in the Gulf of Mexico, at the mouth of Rope's Pass in the State of Texas, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. HAWLEY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 552) to amend the act approved March 1, 1887, relating to the Hospital Corps of the Army, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. HAWLEY. The bill (S. 1417) to amend the military record of Joseph H. Moore shows in the text thereof that he was in the naval force. The Committee on Military Affairs ask to be excused from the further consideration of the bill and that it be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. WHITE, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 43) for the relief of the personal representatives of Adelia Cheatham, deceased, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. CAMERON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 256) for the relief of Augustus Boyd, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. VEST, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1668) to authorize and regulate the construction of a bridge across the Kootenai River, at the town of Fry, county of Kootenai, State of Idaho, reported it with amendments.

Mr. BLODGETT, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1220) granting a pension to Eliza K. Starr, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. WALTHALL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 113) to establish a military post near Little Rock, Ark., reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. PALMER, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom were referred the following bills, reported adversely thereon, and the bills were postponed indefinitely:

A bill (S. 1002) for relief of William C. Gilpatrick;

A bill (S. 1510) for relief of Jacob Barr;

A bill (S. 1065) for the relief of James R. Mullikin, late captain Company K, Thirty-fifth Regiment Indiana Volunteers; and

A bill (S. 1145) for the relief of John W. Sturtevant.

Mr. FRYE, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1608) to make Punta Gorda, Fla., a port of entry, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill (S. 1956) to amend an act entitled "An act establishing a customs collection district in Florida, to be known as the collection district of Tampa, and for other purposes," approved March 1, 1889, and to make Punta Gorda a subport of entry; which was read twice by its title.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. VEST introduced a bill (S. 1934) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a court of private land claims, and to provide for the settlement of private land claims in certain States and Territorries," approved March 3, 1891; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CULLOM introduced a bill (S. 1935) to establish a railway bridge across the Illinois River, between a point at or near the city of Havana in Mason County, and a point on the opposite side of said river in Fulton County, in the State of Illinois; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1936) to recognize Elias J. Beymer as an enrolling officer and for relief of his widow and minor children; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1937) for the relief of James L. Williams; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1938) authorizing the restoration of the name of Wilbur F. Melbourne, late first lieutenant Fifteenth United States Infantry, to the rolls of the Army, and providing that he be placed on the list of retired officers; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. VANCE introduced a bill (S. 1939) for the relief of Joseph C. Hogan; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. PUGH introduced a bill (S. 1940) for the relief of R. B. Woodson; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. TURPIE (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1941) for the relief of Nimrod D. Kineaster; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. McMILLAN introduced a bill (S. 1942) for the relief of the heirs of William A. Burt, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. POWER introduced a bill (S. 1943) for the relief of William Flannery; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1944) for the construction and completion of suitable school buildings for Indian industrial school in Montana; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1945) granting to the State of Montana 5 per centum of the net proceeds of the sales of public lands in that State; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1946) to amend the act of October 2, 1888, concerning the selection of reservoir sites, etc.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1947) for the relief of John G. Evans; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. PERKINS introduced a bill (S. 1948) to authorize the Southern Kansas Railway Company to construct and maintain a pipe line from the North Fork of the Canadian River, Indian Territory, to said railroad; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. SAWYER introduced a bill (S. 1949) to amend section 3117 of the Revised Statutes of the United States in relation to the coasting trade on the Great Lakes; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MANDERSON introduced a bill (S. 1950) donating 20 acres of land from the Fort Sidney military reservation, on the northeast corner thereof, to the city of Sidney, Nebr., for cemetery purposes; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1951) to relieve John Friedlin from the charge of desertion; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, and referred to the Committe on Military Affairs.

Mr. PASCO introduced a bill (S. 1952) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend the statutes in relation to immediate transportation of dutiable goods, and for other purposes," approved June 10, A. D. 1880, by extending the privileges of the first and seventh sections thereof to the port of St. Augustine, Fla.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. COCKRELL (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1953) for the relief of Capt. Ceran St. Vrain's company of New Mexico Mounted Volunteers; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military affairs.

Mr. HAWLEY introduced a bill (S. 1954) for the relief of Lewis D. Allen; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MITCHELL introduced a bill (S. 1955) granting an increase of pension to Robert Steward; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WOLCOTT introduced a bill (S. 1957) for the relief of Meyer B. Haas; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. TELLER introduced a bill (S. 1958) to submit to the Court of Claims the title of William McGarrahan to the Rancho "Panoche Grande," in the State of California, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. TURPIE, it was Ordered, That the petition and accompanying papers of Mrs. Ellen A. King, of La Fayette, Ind., now on the files of the Senate of the last Congress, in relation to the correction of the military record of her late husband, Alexander King, be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs for consideration.

PRINTING OF SENATE BILLS, ETC.

Mr. PEFFER. I submit the following resolution, and ask for its immediate consideration:

Resolved by the Senate, That there be printed, in document form, one hundred copies each of the following: Senate bills Nos. 257, 358, 259, 1268, and 1269; also miscellaneous document No. 18 and Senate joint resolution No. 32, to be placed in the document room.

Mr. MANDERSON. The resolution should be referred to the Committee on Printing. It is necessary that it should be referred under the law.

Mr. PEFFER. Let the resolution be referred.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

SUBPŒNAS FOR SENATE COMMITTEES.

Mr. HOAR submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Privileges and Elections be directed to prepare a proper form of subpœna for requiring the attendance of witnesses to be used by the Senate and the committees thereof, and to report the same for the information of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. O. TOWLES, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

A bill (H. R. 28) to amend an act entitled "An act granting the right of way to the Hutchison and Southern Railroad Company through the Indian Territory;" and

A bill (H. R. 517) providing for the completion of the allotment of lands to the Cheyenne and Arapahoe Indians.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. CARLISLE. Mr. President, I ask leave of absence from the sittings of the Senate for one week.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Leave of absence will be granted to the Senator from Kentucky, if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

RECIPROCAL TRADE AGREEMENTS.

Mr. HALE. I desire to call up the resolution submitted by me a few days ago for the purpose of making some remarks. I ask the Secretary to read the resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. HALE on the 18th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be, and is hereby, directed to send to the Senate, as early as is practicable, copies of all agreements made with other countries relating to an interchange of trade and commerce under the provisions of section 3 of an act entitled "An act to reduce the revenue and equalize duties on imports, and for other purposes," approved October 1, 1890; and also to furnish the Senate with all information received as to the practical effect of such agreements.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, in the present happy subsidence of the war note, I hope Senators will feel that it is fitting to turn our attention to some of the victories of peace.

The answer to the resolution offered by me in the Senate a few days since, and which has just been read, will furnish the information called for more in detail than can be known at present; but I have already possessed myself of information and facts sufficient, I believe, to justify me in setting forth something of the history of the reciprocity movement, the helping hand it has received, and the delays and hinderances which have been put in its pathway in certain quarters, and the tangible results up to the present time.

Touching this last, it must be borne in mind that the oldest treaty or agreement for reciprocity, under section 3 of the McKinley act, has been in force but nine months, and that the treaties or agreements following have some of them but just passed into actual operation.

The desire for extended trade, through the agency of reciprocity treaties, between the United States and her sister nations and dependencies of the American hemisphere, has moved in the minds of practical statesmen for many years. Different Administrations had made essays in this direction. Gen. Garfield, President Arthur, and others had looked with impatience upon the spectacle of a rapidly increasing trade and commerce among the nations of Central and South America, in which we had little part; but no way had been devised through which our trade with them could be augmented till near the closing days of the first session of the Fifty-first Congress.

On the 2d of September, 1890, I called up the original reciprocity amendment to the tariff bill, which was then under discussion, which I had introduced on the 19th of June previous, and which had been referred to the Committee on Finance. The amendment had been prepared at the State Department, and reads as follows:

And the President of the United States is hereby authorized, without further legislation, to declare the ports of the United States free and open to all products of any nation of the American hemisphere upon which no export duties are imposed, whenever and so long as such nation shall admit to its ports, free of all national, provincial (State), municipal, and other taxes, flour, corn meal, and other breadstuffs, preserved meats, fish, vegetables and fruits, cotton-seed oil, rice, and other provisions, including all articles of food, lumber, furniture, and all other articles of wood, agricultural implements and machinery, mining and mechanical machinery, structural steel and iron, steel rails, locomotives, railway cars and supplies, street cars, refined petroleum, or such other products of the United States as may be agreed upon.

It undoubtedly covered the plan which the State Department had in view to attain practical reciprocity.

The amendment gave rise to extended discussion, was carefully considered in the Committee on Finance, which later in the session reported the reciprocity feature in what is known as the Aldrich amendment, which on the 9th day of September was adopted by the Senate and made a part of the tariff act, being the third section of that act.

The vote of the Senate showed that already one of the great national parties was found in substantial unanimity in favor of the scheme, while the other was arrayed in solid phalanx against it. That it may be seen how marked this line of difference was drawn I give the list of yeas and nays in the Senate upon the adoption of the amendment:

It is an illustration of what the world has seen for thirty years, that, even upon plain business propositions touching the common good of all the country, and the every-day life and prosperity of the people, upon which, if anywhere, there should be no party division, the Democratic party selects the darkness rather than the light for its standing ground.

As some attempt has been made to show that the original reciprocity amendment received rude treatment at the hands of the Senate and that its original authors were not considered in the legislation of Congress, I may state here that, after the changed condition resulting from the repeal of nearly all of the sugar duty, the Aldrich amendment was heartily accepted by the friends of the original amendment in the Senate, by the Secretary of State, and by the President.

The basis of the original amendment was the retention of the sugar duty till reciprocal treaties could be negotiated. When that basis was changed and the repeal became a fixed fact it is difficult to see what other plan than the Aldrich amendment could be devised. For one I voted most heartily for its incorporation into the McKinley bill and never had a doubt as to its beneficent operation.

The people of the United States, Mr. President, broad and large, gave a generous welcome to the reciprocity scheme from the moment that it appeared in Congress, and no measure of the present Administration has received more hearty public support than this. In fact, repeated expressions of public favor were needed before the project found favor in certain quarters. Influences ephemerally potential in the Republican party were arrayed against it, but all this disappeared when expressions in its favor came pouring in during the summer and early fall of 1890 from boards of trade and commerce, from district and State conventions, and indeed from all the places where the people gathered together to discuss and commend the reciprocity plan.

Attempts were made in certain quarters to show that the reciprocity plan was opposed to and interfered with the great doctrine of protection to American labor to which the Republican party is fully committed; but all this disappeared when it was seen by the people that what was comprehended in the scheme was an increased trade with countries that produce articles which we can not produce, which articles we can purchase with the products of our farms and mines and manufactories, which our southern sister nations need and which they can not produce. Reciprocity of this kind is in fact an aid to protection and broadens the field of the American laborer by opening new markets for his products to be paid for in articles which can never compete with his labor. The people all understand this, and they made their voice heard and their wishes known here and in the Chamber at the other end of the Capitol, and, except in the Democratic party, open opposition was drowned and no further hostile note was heard.

I do not hesitate, Mr. President, in stating here and now, as the result of my observation, that I firmly believe that section 3 of the McKinley bill, which contains the reciprocity feature, is the part of the measure which has floated the whole act, and which kept it from being swamped by the storm which, without reason, broke upon it from the day of its passage. The great merits of other parts of the McKinley bill might have sunk under a sea of obloquy and would never have been seen and appreciated if the reciprocity clause had not kept the whole structure from going down.

I come now to take up the situation which the Administration and the State Department found themselves confronted with after the passage of the bill.

The power given to the President by section 3 of the tariff act to reimpose duties upon certain articles, the products of other countries, whenever he shall believe that duties and exactions upon the products of the United States in these countries are reciprocally unreasonable, was the leverage under which treaties or agreements were to be negotiated. Without this power no inducements could be urged with the representatives of the Central and South American nations as a reason for lowering their tariff upon our products and giving up a valuable portion of their revenues.

In the first attempts at negotiation the President and the Secretary of State found themselves hampered and hindered by the position of the opposition press throughout the country. It was alleged by these newspapers that this power would never be carried into effect; that no President would venture to reimpose duties on coffee, sugar, and other articles after they had once been admitted free. The Democratic newspapers claimed that no foreign nation would negotiate a treaty or give the subject attention because the measure was a partisan one and part of an offensive tariff act, which, on the first change of parties, would be repealed. It was also contended that the measure was unconstitutional in conferring legislative power upon the President for the imposition of taxes in his own discretion.

Evidences appeared showing clearly that the leaders of the Democratic party had become alarmed at the growing popularity with the people of the reciprocity plan, born of distinguished Republican parentage, and adopted, at last, by the Republican party in general, and were determined to belittle it and deride it and to drive it from its lodgment in the good will of the people. Democratic newspapers denounced it everywhere as an impracticable sham, and wherever Democratic authority was heard from it carried with it a sneer against the measure.

The Senator from New York, who has lately entered this Chamber as a member of this body, and who has brought to his party as his credential of leadership upon the other side the trophy of a great State, chained and gagged and despoiled of her political rights, paused for a moment in his work of spoliation to declare in the Democratic State convention of New York, which assembled in Saratoga on the 16th of September last to do his will and to register his decree, that the Democratic party of the State of New York in convention assembled renews the pledges of its fidelity to Democratic faith, and to denounce in terms (I give the words of the platform) "the Blaine reciprocity humbug."

These vicious attacks upon the measure at the hands of Democratic newspapers and leaders had their inevitable result; they weakened the effect of the measure abroad, made hard the task of our negotiators; they strengthened the hands of foreign governments; they were mischievous, unpatriotic, and were meant to be deadly in their effect, both at home and abroad.

Importers who brought the products affected by the measure into our markets were influenced by these attacks, and communicated their doubts and fears to their correspondents abroad. Articles from Democratic newspapers were translated and reproduced in the sugar and coffee producing countries; all carrying the impression that the reciprocity provision in the tariff act was an idle menace which would never be enforced, and, without danger to the foreign producer that it would be enforced, we had nothing to trade on.

We had repealed, at different times, the duties upon great foreign products, which, at the time of their repeal, might have been used to induce foreign governments to reduce their duties on our products. We had given up coffee, tea, and hides, and, last and greatest of all, had given up sugar; and never before in giving up any of these had we sought to acquire any advantages with the countries producing these articles in return. Their impositions upon our products had continued as great as ever, and in some cases had been increased. The time had now come when we were to try to retrace our steps and get back some of the advantages which we had so blindly thrown away.

That proper credit may be given where credit is due, I wish to say, Mr. President, that the whole force of the Administration was brought to bear in the work of negotiating these treaties. The President gave it his careful and constant attention and entered heart and soul into the conduct of the negotiation. The Secretary of State gave to the work his days and nights and risked health and life in his great labors. Their efforts were supplemented by the invaluable assistance of that veteran American diplomatist, Hon. John W. Foster, whose handiwork is seen in all the details of the treaties.

The first country approached was Brazil. For the ten years preceding the year 1890 we had received of Brazil's goods and products $502,547,258, and had sent back only $83,432,557. The balance of more than $400,000,000 against us had been paid to Brazil in money which had gone to purchase English, French, and German products which the Brazilians needed, and which we ought to have sent to them instead of the gold which they made us pay.

The chief products of Brazil sent to us are coffee, rubber, hides, and sugar. The first three have for years been admitted free, and the tariff act which had just been passed had practically placed sugar on the free list, thus letting in the entire product of Brazil free of duty.

The reverse side of this was not a pleasing thing for our negotiators to contemplate. Brazil imposed a heavy duty upon almost every one of our products, and ever since the duty on coffee was removed, in 1872, the United States, through its ministers to Brazil, has tried to obtain some concession to American products from the Government of Brazil as a compensation for the free admission of coffee from that country. Nothing came of this till the passage of the tariff act of October, 1890. The power conferred upon the President to reimpose duties on coffee, sugar, and hides brought the Brazilian Government at once to a sense of the marked difference in the tariff conditions of the two countries, and speedy progress was made to a reciprocity arrangement by which Brazil gave feee admission to a valuable list of American products and to a reduction of duties on another valuable list; thus approximating an equality of treatment in tariffs.

For the last ten or twelve years we have taken annually from Brazil about $60,000,000 and have sent there about $10,000,000 per year, leaving a difference against us of nearly $50,000,000 per annum. Brazil has been in a condition of uneasiness and ferment ever since the treaty went into effect in April and the conditions are not favorable for judging as to the effect of the new arrangement; but, under the impetus of this arrangement, our export trade with that country has increased in the last eight months nearly $2,000,000 compared with the corresponding trade in the previous year, which year, up to that time, was the largest in the history of our trade with Brazil.

The table which I submit shows that of the articles to be admitted free into Brazil under the arrangement, the total annual average importations amounted to $20,399,000, of which the United States only furnished $3,394,633. Of the articles to be admitted at the preferential reduction of 25 per cent, the total annual importations into Brazil have been $38,631,243, of which the United States furnished only $2,035,839. The two schedules together show a total annual importation into Brazil of $58,635,182, of which only $5,430,532 came from the United States, against $53,204,650 from other countries.

Considering all the conditions of Brazil, the increased trade of nearly $2,000,000 in the last seven or eight months, over the largest trade which we have had with Brazil for the corresponding time, indicates unerringly that the United States under this arrangement will maintain a trade with Brazil which in time must bring our exportations there nearly or quite equal to the importations from that country.

The next country with which negotiations were opened under section 3 of the tariff act was Spain, with a view to increasing our trade with the colonial islands of Cuba and Porto Rico. At once the powerful effect of the reciprocity provision of the tariff was made apparent. For the past twenty years our trade relations with Cuba have been more unsatisfactory than with any foreign country. Our commerce has been subjected to annoyance and embarrassment in entering the ports of the island, causing delay and expense to our vessels and to our exported articles. Not a month has passed that complaints have not arisen where American vessels and American cargoes have suffered annoyance and expense by excessive tariff duties and exacting customs regulations; and so great have been these difficulties that the United States producer, conditions favoring, has preferred other markets to the Cuban.

Here we have taken of Cuban products, each year, about $52,000,000 and have only returned $11,000,000 per year of our own goods. But the market of the United States had become a necessity to the Cuban sugar-planters. Since the great development of the beet-sugar industry in Europe, Cuba has been driven almost out of that market for its sugar. The bounty system adopted by France, Germany, and Austria gives beet sugar a large advantage in England and other European markets, and this, added to the heavier freights and long time consumed in the voyage, makes it impossible for Cuban sugar to compete successfully in the European markets with beet sugar. This has shut Cuba up to the market of the United States.

The passage of the reciprocity provision in the tariff bill brought the Cuban sugar-planter face to face with the question whether new advantages should be given to the trade of the United States by him or he should see his own industry ruined and his plantation abandoned. When this negotiation was opened the representatives of the State Department found the Spanish Government fully impressed with the belief that the power given to the President by section 3 of the tariff act would never be enforced.

All of the arguments originally advanced against the amendment, and the articles in Democratic newspapers predicting that nothing would come of it, had been carefully gathered by the Spanish authorities, and our negotiators were told that Spain and Cuba expected the benefit of free sugar without being obliged to give anything in return; but when they were assured that the President would carry the law into execution in good faith, the Spanish Government at once entered upon the negotiation of an arrangement which culminated in a treaty having two sets of provisions.

Spain has certain commercial treaties with European governments by which those governments are entitled to the same favors in Cuba as may be granted to any other nation; but fortunately these treaties expire on June 30, 1892. The Spanish Government therefore proposed to make a transitory schedule of articles for free or favored admission into Cuba and Porto Rico, to be put into force at once, composed of such products as could be most successfully exported from the United States, and beyond this to agree to a comprehensive schedule of articles to be put into operation on the 1st of July, 1892, when the European reciprocity treaties would cease to have effect. On account of this arrangement the United States has not yet felt the full effects of the commercial treaty, and will not till after the 1st of July next.

If Senators, however, will examine the transitory schedule, which I will incorporate with my remarks, they will see that we have obtained large favors, especially for American agricultural products. Among these all kinds of meats, heretofore paying heavy duties, are now admitted to Cuba entirely free. Lard also, which we have sent to Cuba to the extent of nearly two and one-half millions of dollars annually, and which has heretofore paid a duty of 4½ cents a pound, is now admitted free. If any Senator doubts the efficacy of this treaty let him ask if, with a duty of 4½ cents per pound, 33,000,000 pounds of lard have been annually exported from the United States, how large is this exportation likely to be when it will hereafter be admitted entirely free of duty. So also fish, fresh and salt, of all kinds, are admitted free. All agricultural products, oats, barley, and rye, cotton-seed oil, hay, fruits, fresh and preserved, vegetables, all kinds of wood and lumber, wagons, sewing-machines, raw petroleum, and coal are admitted free.

Mr. GIBSON of Louisiana. Has the Senator referred to the increase of the exportations of flour to Cuba?

Mr. HALE. I am coming to that. I am glad the Senator has asked me with reference to flour.

For years there has been a constant struggle going on between the American and the Spanish peninsula exporters of flour for the possession of the Cuban market, the tariff schedules of Cuba admitting flour from the home country at a much lower rate than that from the United States. Notwithstanding this discrimination in favor of Spanish flour, our own flour has been able to compete with the Spanish so as to about equally divide the trade up to the 1st day of July, 1890, when the Spanish Government decreed the free admission of Spanish flour into Cuba and added 20 per cent to the duty previously paid on American flour, making the duty, under this decree, $5.64 per barrel.

Mr. FRYE. That was about 100 per cent, was it not?

Mr. HALE. This was equivalent to prohibition, and practically drove American flour from the Cuban market.

If Senators will examine the new reciprocity treaty negotiated with Spain they will see that, under the menace of a reimposition of the sugar duties, Spain agreed to admit American flour at a duty of $1 per 100 kilograms, which is about 90 cents a barrel. With this small duty, the cheapness of American flour, and the advantage in freights, by nearness of the market, give to this country a complete monopoly of the Cuban flour market, and the industry of the Spanish wheat-grower and miller has been in effect destroyed. The added trade that we have gained with Cuba alone in this would prove the wisdom of the reciprocity feature of the tariff act of 1890.

The same results apply to corn and corn meal, the duties of which have been reduced from 66 cents per 100 kilograms to 11 cents, making it a mere nominal tax, and giving to the United States complete control of the market in these articles. The table which I present here will show the value of this transitory schedule for American goods.

The more extended treaty, which goes into effect on the 1st day of July next, gives to the United States almost a monopoly of the Cuban trade, as in it not only are agricultural products admitted free of duty but a great list of our manufactured products are included, and other large lists at a reduction of 25 and 50 per cent of the existing tariffs. Cuba and Porto Rico give our exporters such an advantage over European competitors as to amount to a control of the markets.

Mr. VEST. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. VEST. Going back in the Senator's remarks, I was not able to understand him in regard to the exports of flour from the United States to Cuba. I wish to ask him what is the tariff now upon American flour to Cuba?

Mr. HALE. Five dollars and sixty-four cents.

Mr. VEST. And the new treaty does not take effect, as I understand, until July, 1892.

Mr. HALE. It will not go into practical effect until July 1, 1892.

Mr. COCKRELL. Is that per barrel?

Mr. HALE. Per barrel. The duty under the new treaty is about 90 cents per barrel.

Mr. VEST. The present duty is how much?

Mr. HALE. Ninety cents, under the new treaty.

Mr. VEST. Ninety-three cents.

Mr. HALE. One dollar per 100 kilograms, which, if the Senator will make his figuring, he will see will amount to about 90 cents a barrel.

Mr. VEST. Ninety cents; but that does not matter, as I understood the Senator to say the present duty upon flour was $5.95.

Mr. HALE. No; $5.64.

Mr. VEST. That will last until July 1, 1892?

Mr. HALE. The transitory schedule that has lately taken effect covers the article of flour.

Mr. VEST. That is the question I asked, and I understood the Senator to say the duty was $5.64.

Mr. HALE. I thought when the Senator spoke of the present duty he meant under the present tariff without regard to this arrangement.

Mr. VEST. When does the transitory treaty take effect?

Mr. HALE. That has taken effect.

Mr. VEST. When did it take effect?

Mr. HALE. I do not know the exact date. It is now in effect, and the comprehensive schedule, which practically takes in all the products and either makes them free or makes a reduction of 25 or 50 per cent, takes effect on the 1st of July.

Mr. VEST. That is the general treaty, but I want to know about the transitory treaty.

Mr. HALE. I do not know the day that it went into effect.

Mr. VEST. I will ask the Senator if it is not the fact that since the imposition of the duty of 93 cents upon the exportations of flour to Cuba, which is really a discrimination of 93 cents in favor of the Spanish flour, there has been an increase of importations from Spain to Cuba largely in excess of the importations from the United States to Cuba?

Mr. HALE. Not at all, Mr. President. We shall not get that market entire for perhaps a year or two. At the time when this treaty went into effect Spain was sending all of the flour to Cuba, and our trade began to advance at once and is increasing every month, and within a year or two years I look with the greatest confidence to our having the entire monopoly. We shall drive the Spanish exporter from the market in a comparatively short time, but we can not do it all in three months.

Mr. VEST. That is the very point, and if the facts show, as I think they will show, the cold figures that under this treaty of 93 cents, which is a discrimination, as I said, of that much in favor of Spanish flour, the market for Spanish flour has largely increased in Cuba over the American flour, how is it possible that under the same duty, which is continued under the general treaty to July 1, 1892, we can ever take that market away from them?

Mr. HALE. Why, Mr. President, the distance, the shortness of freight, and our cheap flour—I mean by that the small cost of manufacturing—much more than overcome the discrimination of 90 cents.

Mr. VEST. Then it ought to have done it in the last six months, and why has it not done it with that duty? The same distance exists, the same cheapness of flour exists, and we have had an enormous wheat crop in Minnesota and Dakota, larger than has ever been known in this country. Notwithstanding that fact, the Spanish flour merchants are able, with a discrimination of 93 cents in their favor, to hold that market practically against the United States.

Mr. HALE. They do not hold the market. They are struggling and making an effort to keep up their trade, but it is diminishing all the time and ours is increasing. The whole treaty does not take effect until July 1, but I am willing to predict to the Senator, and I am willing to wait and see the result, that within one year from this time the American shipper of wheat will have the monopoly. The Spanish peninsula producer can not compete with him, and the 93 cents duty is more than made up by the short distance and our cheaper made flour.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PASCO in the chair). The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business.

Mr. ALLISON. I hope the unfinished business may be informally laid aside in order that the Senator from Maine may complete his observations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be informally laid aside to enable the Senator from Maine to conclude his remarks. If there be no objection, that will be the order. The Chair hears none, and the Senator from Maine will proceed.

Mr. HALE. I shall soon be through, Mr. President.

The good effects of this treaty touch the political future of these islands of the Spanish Main as well as the commercial future. The control which, under this treaty, the United States will have of the commerce of Cuba will lead more largely to the investment of our American capital in this island. It will attach Cuba more and more to the United States. It will make it less dependent upon Spain and less valuable to her as a colony, because heretofore it has been kept largely as a market for Spanish goods. When Cuba ceases to have commercial or financial value for Spain the interest of that country in its possession will diminish and Cuba will naturally attain independence or become a part of our own great system. Reciprocity with American Republics and American colonies brings them all nearer to the United States in every way.

The next reciprocity arrangement was made with the Dominican Republic. Its trade is small; but in a commercial and political aspect it was important that it should be included in the scope of these new treaties. The schedules which I present show that valuable favors are conferred upon American agricultural and manufactured products, and the operation of this arrangement will bring this Republic into closer harmony and nearer relations with the United States, both commercially and politically.

The fourth reciprocity arrangement concluded was that with Germany, which is important, both in a commercial and political view. By means of reciprocity treaties already negotiated with Austria, Italy, Switzerland, and Belgium, the products of those countries have been given great advantage in the German markets, and the competition between these, especially Austria and Hungary, with our own products is close. By this treaty we have obtained a reduction of duty on a very important list of our agricultural products, as is shown by a schedule which I here submit.

One immediate effect of the reciprocity provision of the tariff act, so far as Germany is concerned, in the power given to the President to levy duty on German sugar, was to bring about an agreement removing the prohibition on American pork into German ports in September last; and this has been followed by Sweden and Norway, Denmark, France, Italy, and Austria. It was here, as in Cuba and in Brazil, that the tremendous leverage of the power of the President to reimpose the duty on sugar worked and brought about these concessions to American trade.

Another point of view of the German arrangement is that it commits that Government to the principle of reciprocity, always contended for by the United States, that the general "favored-nation" clause in treaties does not give to other nations the right to enjoy the privileges of a reciprocity arrangement without granting proper concessions therefor. Although the United States has a favored nation stipulation in many of its treaties with other countries, it has never understood that stipulation to secure to foreign countries the privileges which it concedes by virtue of a reciprocity treaty.

The United States has a reciprocity treaty with the Hawaiian Islands by which an important list of products in that country is admitted free into the United States in consideration of the free admission of a long list of American products and American manufactures into the Hawaiian Kingdom. This Government has never admitted the right of Germany to claim the admission into the United States of similar German products free of duty, because of the reciprocity treaty with the Hawaiian Islands; nor has the Hawaiian Government admitted German or British manufactures into that country free because by the treaty American goods were admitted free into those islands. Germany, by the reciprocity treaty, recognized the American construction of the favored-nation clause in treaties.

One of the last reciprocity arrangements concluded has been with the British Government, and embraces its sugar and coffee-producing colonies of Jamaica, Barbados, the Windward Islands, the Leeward Islands, Trinidad, and British Guiana. With these we have at present a considerable trade in American products, and they also produce a large amount of sugar.

The history of these negotiations is interesting to any one who has the time to follow it in detail; for, at first the British Government showed no inclination whatever to enter into any negotiations under the reciprocity provision of the tariff act touching their colonies, and this indifference continued till after the Brazilian, Spanish, Dominican, and German reciprocity arrangements had shown that the provision of Congress on the subject was to be a complete success.

When the sugar planters of the British colonial islands found that their competing neighbors were getting the benefit of the reciprocity arrangement and thereby, in giving concessions to American trade, were to avoid the danger of a reimposition of the sugar duty, they saw at once that unless a like arrangement was made for them their market for their product was gone, and they followed in the same line with the planters of Cuba, and compelled their reluctant home government to negotiate a treaty, giving the United States the same advantage of reduced duties that had been conceded by the other countries.

After the fashion of British diplomacy every point was taken and every argument offered against negotiating this treaty; but the demand of the planters became so strong, enforced by representatives which they sent from the different islands to Washington, that the home government yielded, and in two treaties, one covering Jamaica and the second the other colonies, all the advantages which had been gained with other countries were conceded by the British Government in her colonies.

The tables which I here submit show the operations of this treaty. It is worth noting that an examination of these tables shows that, under the tariffs which Great Britain had arranged for her colonies, Jamaica for instance, while the products of the United States imported into that island only amounted to 34 per cent of the total imports of the island, these products from the United States yielded 46 per cent of the customs revenues of the colony; and further, that the average rate of duty on United States imports was 26⅛ per cent, while the average rate of duties on imports from other countries was only 16 per cent. Up to the passage of the reciprocity feature of the tariff of 1890 Great Britain had so manipulated the tariff of Jamaica that, while we were furnishing the smaller share of the trade, we contributed the larger share of the revenue.

The table which shows the trade and tariff with Trinidad discloses the same condition. Under the old rates of duty, where the imports from the United States amounted to only 26½ per cent of the entire importation, the duties from those products amounted to 45 per cent of the total customs revenues. The average rate of duties imposed on our products was 26½ per cent, while upon other countries the corresponding rates were only 11½ per cent.

These facts, brought out by investigation, enabled our negotiators to convince the British Government that the tariffs of their West India colonies could not be considered by the President as "reasonable and equal," and that it would be necessary, in order to secure for the products of those colonies exemption from the duties congress had conferred power to reimpose, for negotiations to be entered upon for such a readjustment of the tariffs of those colonies as would remove, in some degree, the unfavorable discrimination pointed out.

When this declaration was made by the Secretary of State, it brought, very promptly, from the colonies to Washington, delegations of their most prominent officials and best informed men in commerce to assist the British minister in the negotiation of reciprocity arrangements, and resulted in the treaty, which was signed the latter part of December between the British minister and Secretary Blaine, which has been published and the schedules of which I here present. Almost all the discriminations which these tables show have heretofore existed against American products will cease under the new arrangement.

The good work, Mr. President, is by no means completed. Negotiations are pending with other Central and South American republics which can only be hindered from producing the same results as in other countries by the hostility of the opposition to the entire measure. This hostility has already shown itself as the other end of the Capitol, and, if the policy started there it followed here, we shall soon listen to Senators upon the other side of the Chamber fulminating against reciprocity, and threatening that, if any added power is given to them, the repeal of the entire McKinley bill, including the reciprocity provision, will follow.

The movement already made in the other House to repeal the existing reciprocity provision in the McKinley act, and to substitute for it the original amendment, gives indication of laggard recognition of the popularity and merit of reciprocity, but it ignores the actual conditions which can not now be changed. The reciprocity amendment, adopted by a Republican Congress and signed by a Republican President, was based upon the determination of the Republican party to put upon the tables of the American people untaxed sugar and to reduce the snrplus revenues of the country to the extent of $60,000,000 per year.

Starting with that proposition, as I have said before, no other scheme than that of the Aldrich amendment could be devised by which the countries producing the articles named in the amendment could be induced to give up a portion of their revenues and lower their duties upon our own exportations to those countries. What I have said, if it has shown anything, has shown the great success which has thus far attended the negotiation of treaties under this amendment.

To attempt to revive the original amendment now is worse than absurd, for it was only intended to apply and only could apply before the duty upon sugar had been repealed. It is only the device of the opposition and an attempt to mislead the American people. Whether these attacks will so far influence the South American people, who have not already negotiated these treaties, as to hinder further agreements no man can tell; but the good results that have thus far been attained are now being appreciated and will, for long years, be appreciated by the American people.

When I had the honor of originally bringing the attention of the Senate to this subject, in the amendment which I offered in June, 1890, I took occasion to say that no matter what fault was found with the plan, no matter what opposition was raised to it, no matter that Senators on the other side of the Chamber voted solidly against it, yet, the people would accept it and embrace it, and that reciprocity, as a part of our tariff legislation, had come to stay with the American people. It is the handmaiden and ally of protection. It is diametrically opposed to free trade. It means more products and more manufactures here and more sales abroad, while free trade means less manufactures and less products here and more purchases abroad. One way lie thrift, content, happy households, and general prosperity. The other way lie underpaid labor, discontent, suffering, and poverty.

I notify gentlemen on the other side that they have not heard the last of this. This achievement of Republican statesmanship will be carried before the people in the next Presidential canvass throughout the entire extent of this broad land. There is no farmer, no manufacturer, no miner, no laborer who is not interested in its success and its maintenance as a part of our system of foreign trade, and, when at last, it has become incorporated and accepted as a part of our national policy we may look to see our Democratic brethren flocking to its support, and trusting to that short memory, which is said to be common to all peoples, claiming to be the author and finisher of this great achievement.

16. Cotton seed and its products.
17. Crucibles and melting pots of all kinds.
18. Eggs.
19. Fertilizers of all kinds, natural and artificial.
20. Fish, fresh or on ice, and salmon and oysters in cans.
21. Fishing apparatus of all kinds.
22. Fruits and vegetables, fresh and dried, when not canned, tinned, or bottled.
23. Gas fixtures and pipes.
24. Gold and silver coin of the United States and bullion.
25. Hay and straw for forage.
26. Houses of wood, complete.
27. Ice.
28. India-rubber and gutta-percha goods, including waterproof clothing made wholly or in part thereof.
29. Implements, utensils, and tools for agriculture, exclusive of cutlasses and forks.
30. Lamps and lanterns.
31. Lime of all kinds.
32. Locomotives, railway rolling stock, rails, railway ties, and all materials and appliances for railways and tramways.
33. Marble or alabaster, in the rough or squared, worked or carved, for building purposes or monuments.
34. Medicinal extracts and preparations of all kinds, including proprietary or patent medicines, but exclusive of quinine or preparations of quinine, opium, gauge, and bhang.
35. Paper of all kinds for printing.
36. Paper of wood or straw for wrapping and packing, including surface coated or glazed.
37. Photographic apparatus and chemicals.
38. Printers' ink, all colors.
39. Printing presses, types, rules, spaces, and all accessories for printing.
40. Quicksilver.
41. Resin, tar, pitch and turpentine.
42. Salt.
43. Sewing machines, and all parts and accessories thereof.
44. Shipbuilding materials and accessories of all kinds, when used in the construction, equipment, or repair of vessels or boats of any kind, except rope and cordage of all kinds, including wire rope.
45. Starch of Indian corn or maize.
46. Steam and power engines, and machines, machinery, and apparatus, whether stationary or portable, worked by power or by hand, for agriculture, irrigation, mining, the arts and industries of all kinds, and all necessary parts and appliances for the erection or repair thereof or the communication of motive power thereto.
47. Steam boilers and steam pipes.
48. Sulphur.
49. Tan bark of all kinds, whole or ground.
50. Telegraph wire, telegraphic, telephonic, and electrical apparatus and appliances of all kinds for communication or illumination.
51. Trees, plants, vines, and seeds and grains of all kinds, for propagation or cultivation.
52. Varnish, not containing spirits.
53. Wall papers.
54. Watches when not cased in gold or silver; and watch movements uncased.
55. Water pipes of all classes, materials, and dimensions.
56. Wire for fences, with the hooks, staples, nails, and the like appliances for fastening the same.
57. Yeast cake and baking powders.
58. Zinc, tin, and lead, in sheets; asbestus; and tar paper, for roofing.

It is understood that the packages or coverings in which the articles named in the foregoing schedule are imported shall be free of duty if they are usual and proper for the purpose.

SCHEDULE B.

Articles to be admitted at 50 per cent reduction of the duty designated in the respective customs tariff now in force in each of said colonies:

1. Bacon and bacon hams.
2. Boots and shoes made wholly or in part of leather.
3. Bread and biscuit.
4. Cheese.
5. Lard and its compounds.
6. Mules.
7. Oleomargarine.
8. Shooks and staves.

SCHEDULE C.

Articles to be admitted at 25 per cent reduction of the duty designated in the respective customs tariff now in force in each of said colonies:

1. Beef, salted or pickled.
2. Corn or maize.
3. Corn meal.
4. Flour of wheat.
5. Lumber of pitch pine, in rough or prepared for buildings.
6. Petroleum and its products, crude or refined.
7. Pork, salted or pickled.
8. Wheat.

It is understood that No. 4 of this schedule shall not apply to the colony of Trinidad, but it is stipulated that the duty on flour in said colony shall not exceed 75 cents per barrel.

No. 2.

Applicable to the colony of Jamaica and its dependencies.

SCHEDULE A.

Articles to be admitted free of all customs duty and any other national, colonial, or municipal charges:

1. Animals, alive, and poultry.
2. Beef, including tongues, smoked and dried.
3. Beef and pork preserved in cans.

11. Brooms, brushes, and whisks of broom straw.
12. Candles, tallow.
13. Carts, wagons, cars, and barrows, with or without springs, for ordinary roads and agricultural use, not including vehicles of pleasure.
14. Coal and coke.
15. Clocks, mantel or wall.
16. Cotton seed and its products, to include meal, meal cake, oil, and cottolene.
17. Crucibles and melting pots of all kinds.
18. Drawings, paintings, engravings, lithographs, and photographs.
19. Eggs.
20. Fertilizers of all kinds, natural and artificial.
21. Fish, fresh or on ice, and oysters in cans.
22. Fishing apparatus of all kinds.
23. Fruits and vegetables, fresh and dried, when not canned, tinned, or bottled.
24. Gas fixtures and pipes.
25. Gold and silver coin of the United States and bullion.
26. Hay and straw for forage.
27. Houses of wood, complete.
28. Ice.
29. India-rubber and gutta-percha goods, including water-proof clothing made wholly or in part thereof.
30. Implements, utensils, and tools for agriculture, exclusive of cutlasses and forks.
31. Iron, galvanized.
32. Iron for roofing.
33. Lamps and lanterns, not exceeding 10 shillings each in value.
34. Lime of all kinds.
35. Locomotives, railway rolling stock, rails, railway ties, and all materials and appliances for railways and tramways.
36. Marble or alabaster, in the rough or squared, worked or carved, for building purposes or monuments.

37. Paper of all kinds for printing.
38. Paper of wood or straw for wrapping and packing, including surface-coated or glazed.
39. Photographic apparatus and chemicals.
40. Printers' ink, all colors.
41. Printing presses, types, rules, spaces, and all accessories for printing.
42. Proprietary or patent medicines, recommended by their proprietors as calculated to cure disease or alleviate pain in the human subject.
43. Quicksilver.
44. Resin, tar, pitch, and turpentine.
45. Sewing machines and all parts and accessories thereof.
46. Shipbuilding materials and accessories of all kinds, when used in the construction, equipment, or repair of vessels or boats of any kind, except rope and cordage of all kinds, including wire rope, and subject to specific regulations to avoid abuse in the importation.
47. Shooks and staves.
48. Starch of Indian corn or maize.
49. Steam and power engines, and machines, machinery, and apparatus, whether stationary or portable, worked by power or by hand, for agriculture, irrigation, mining, the arts and industries of all kinds, and all necessary parts and appliances for the erection or repair thereof or the communication of motive power thereto.
50. Steam boilers and steam pipes.
51. Sugar, refined.
52. Sulphur.
53. Tallow and animal greases.
54. Tan bark of all kinds, whole or ground.
55. Telegraph wire; telegraphic, telephonic, and electrical apparatus and appliances of all kinds, for communication or illumination.

Lumber of pitch pine, in rough or prepared for buildings, to be reduced to 9 shillings per 1,000 feet.

SCHEDULE C.

Articles to be admitted at 25 per cent reduction of the duty designated in the customs tariff now in force:

1. Beef, salted or pickled.
2. Corn and maize.
3. Corn meal.
4. Oats.
5. Petroleum and its products, crude or refined.
6. Pork, salted or pickled.
7. Wheat.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I wish to take the floor in order to reply to the remarks of the Senator from Maine, but I will give way, of course, now to the regular order. I suppose the resolution of the Senator will lie upon the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That will be the action of the Senate in the absence of objection.

Mr. McPHERSON. Before departing from this subject I wish to ask the Senator from Maine a single question. If I understand the Senator correctly, he states that the increase in exports from this country to Brazil during the period of eight months, since the reciprocal relations have been in operation, has been about $2,000,000. Can the Senator inform the Senate as to the amount of remitted duties to Brazil during that time upon sugar alone, which was the fourth article admitted free of duty? In other words, I wish to get at the fact, if I can, how much the advantage has been to Brazil at the same time that the Senator is showing the advantage to us in exports to Brazil.

Mr. HALE. I have no figures on that point. The Senator can reckon for himself the comparative part of our importations of sugar entire from Brazil in relation to the whole. It is not a very large portion, but the sugar product of Brazil is likely to be increased; large ventures are made in that direction, and it is believed by the Brazilian authorities that Brazil will furnish a much larger proportion of the sugar we shall import in the years to come than it does now. We get the larger supply of our sugar from Cuba.

Mr. ALLISON obtained the floor.

Mr. FRYE. If the Senator will allow me, 87½ per cent of all the importations from all the South American Republics before the McKinley act became a law were brought entirely free of duty into this country, leaving only 12½ per cent that paid any duties whatever. That was before the McKinley act or reciprocity.

Mr. ALLISON. With the leave of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], I should like to ask the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. McPHERSON] a question in connection with this debate; and that is, if he understands that the remission of the sugar duties has benefited Brazil? I understood from the tenor of the Senator's question in asking how much free sugar had come in from Brazil under the so-called McKinley act, that he inferred that the effect of free sugar had been to put the amount of the duty into the Brazilian treasury.

Mr. McPHERSON. I did not say that.

Mr. ALLISON. That was the implication from the Senator's question. I merely wish to know if that is his view.

Mr. McPHERSON. Not at all; but I assume, as a matter of course, if the duty is remitted upon sugar and sugar is put upon the free list in this country, the benefits pass to somebody outside of our country to a certain extent, because we increase the consumption of sugar by that act. But at the same time, if these relations are to be reciprocal, we ought to know exactly to what extent reciprocity is felt by both countries. That was my idea.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to know if the Senator from New Jersey is of opinion that the sugar duty remitted has in any way benefited the Brazilian people as respects their securing a higher price for sugar than they secured before?

Mr. McPHERSON. I do not know that that is a question which naturally belongs to this debate. The only question that I have taken into consideration is this: We were receiving, according to the statement of the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], certain benefits by reason of an increased market to the extent of $2,000,000, being enabled to sell $2,000,000 more of products to Brazil. Now, we have remitted duties upon sugar, which to that extent, as a matter of course, reduces the revenue in our Treasury. If our market is increased and we are benefited by a remission of duties, certainly the Brazilians, to a certain extent, are benefited by reason of the remission of duties here. It was only to that extent that my question applied.

Mr. ALLISON. I did not understand the import of the Senator's question. I supposed he meant to draw an inference that the importation of sugar from Brazil free had the effect to benefit pro tanto Brazil or its people. Now I understand him to say that the remission of duties on the part of Brazil, as they have remitted them in pursuance of this reciprocity policy, has had the effect to improve the condition of Brazil.

Mr. VANCE. Mr. President, I simply want to express my happiness at the turn this discussion has taken. I have listened with great interest to the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], and to the side remarks of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON]. The drift of the whole of them is to show the benefits flowing from the remission of tariff duties, and the whole tendency of the argument is in the direction of the blessings of free and unrestricted trade. Let us think, sir, that there is hope for the country when the truth begins to creep out through crevices of that kind on that side. If it proven, as I understood the Senator from Maine, that the only thing which redeemed the McKinley bill from a flat and absolute failure was the single, solitary free-trade element there was in it, these things are hopeful, and I can say now, in the language of old Simeon, "Lord, let Thy servant depart in peace to his dinner, since his ears have heard the justification of his opinion." [Laughter.]

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, just one word in response to the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE]. The Senator from North Carolina, inferentially at least, is unable to draw the distinction between an article like sugar, which we import to the extent of almost our entire consumption, and other articles which we produce almost entirely. The purport of my question was not specially to reënforce the free-trade theories of the Senator from North Carolina, but only to show as respects this exceptional article of sugar, nine-tenths of which we import, that the duties were paid by our own people.

Mr. VANCE. And went into the Treasury.

Mr. ALLISON. And that by the effect of the McKinley bill those duties have been removed, and sugar has been reduced in price to that extent, and it has no relation to that vast number of articles which we produce in the United States and which are also produced abroad, having both the home competition and the foreign competition affecting the price.

Mr. VANCE. I was not unaware of the distinction which the Senator thinks I was not able to draw. I know very well the distinction between a duty on sugar, which goes into the Treasury of the country, and a duty on manufactured articles which are not included in any treaty of reciprocity, the proceeds of which go into the pockets of his protected friends, the manufacturers. I can see that distinction. I am glad that he acknowledges that he sees it.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. CAMERON. I move that when the Senate adjourn today it be until Monday next, at 12 o'clock m.

The motion was agreed to.

MEXICAN COMMISSION AWARDS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 539) to amend and enlarge the act approved June 18, 1878, entitled "An act to provide for the distribution of the awards made under the convention between the United States of America and the Republic of Mexico," concluded on the 4th day of July, 1868, the pending question being on the motion of Mr. HOAR to strike out the third section of the bill.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I think I can congratulate the Senate this morning that we shall get through with this case before an adjournment, as I do not know that any Senator wishes to speak upon the bill, unless the Senator from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] may desire to do so, of which I have had no notice.

Yesterday I had passed through my statement in regard to the facts of the case of the La Abra Silver Mining Company, and had discussed to some extent the legal questions which had been raised by the suggestions, and objections, perhaps of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] and the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE]. I thought that the decision in Sampeyreac vs. The United States, that I read from 7th Peters' Reports fully and in every particular answered every objection which either of the Senators had presented; and now, looking through what they said yesterday, the meaning and force of which I did not catch precisely in the course of current debate, I am still more fully satisfied that that decision does cover every point that the Senators suggested.

I am not at all wedded to having an appeal taken to the Supreme Court in this case either by the United States or by any defendant in the cause to have it determined, but I can very well understand how if Congress should in this case make an exception in favor of the United States complaint would be made of it and objection would be made to a bill of that character; perhaps it might meet with obstruction in the other branch of Congress. I therefore hope that the Senate will leave that feature in the bill. If it should turn out that we have not the constitutional power (for that is what the question comes to at last, I believe, as presented by the honorable Senators) to bring this case within the appellate jurisdiction of the United States Supreme Court by our legislation, it is very easy for that court so to decide. It can not, however, so decide if it follows the precedent in many cases, some of which I have already cited and to others of which I shall call attention very briefly this morning. So, in any view of the question, I think it is better to leave that section in the bill and not have the case to turn in any sense upon what is an unnecessary controversy as to that feature of the measure.

The Senator from Mississippi yesterday suggested that he had no difficulty at all about the proposition that the Congress of the United States could confer jurisdiction in this case and under this bill upon the Court of Claims, and that we could get a decision from the Court of Claims under the act which would be conclusive in the cause. I think it is a very logical deduction from that statement that the Supreme Court of the United States may have appellate jurisdiction of that same case if we accord it, or rather, if we do not except it from the jurisdiction.

Senators seem to have mistaken the precise attitude that Congress holds to the question of controlling and regulating the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the United States. They state, and correctly, that that appellate jurisdiction is derived from the Constitution. There are some portions of it which in the absence of legislation will be regulated by the rules of the common law, because the common law is referred to in the constitutional grant. At the same time the investiture of jurisdiction, or the apportionment, I will call it, of jurisdiction in judicial matters, is conferred broadly and without any sort of limitation upon the Supreme Court and such inferior courts as Congress may from time to time ordain and establish; but it requires legislative consent and legislative action to put that jurisdiction into effect. In the great leading case of Durousseau vs. The United States, in 6 Cranch, that subject was treated of and settled long years ago. I wish to read some extracts from that cause, not because the Senate is at all interested in it, but I want the record to show the foundation upon which the Committee on Foreign Relations have rested the section of the bill relating to an appeal to the Supreme Court. Chief Justice Marshall delivered the opinion in this case in 1810. The court say:

> The attorney-general having moved to dismiss them—
> The causes—
> because no writ of error lies from this court to that in any case or, if any case, not in such a case as this; the jurisdiction of this court becomes the first subject for consideration.
> The act erecting Louisiana into two territories establishes a district court in the territory of Orleans, consisting of one judge who "shall, in all things, have and exercise the same jurisdiction and powers which are, by law, given to, or may be exercised by, the judge of Kentucky district."
> On the part of the United States it is contended that this description of the jurisdiction of the court of New Orleans does not imply a power of revision in this court similar to that which have been exercised over the judgments of the district court of Kentucky; or, if it does, that a writ of error could not have been sustained to a judgment rendered by the district court of Kentucky in such a case as this.
> On the part of the plaintiffs it is contended that this court possesses a constitutional power to revise and correct the judgment of inferior courts; or, if not so, that such a power is implied in the act by which the court of Orleans is created, taken in connection with the judicial act; and that a writ of error would lie to a judgment rendered by the court for the district of Kentucky in such a case as this.
> Every question originating in the Constitution of the United States claims, and will receive, the most serious consideration of this court.
> The third article of that instrument commences with organizing the judicial department. It consists of one supreme court, and of such inferior courts as Congress shall, from time to time, ordain and establish. In these courts is vested the judicial power of the United States.
> The first clause of the second section enumerates the cases to which that power shall extend.
> The second clause of the same section distributes the power previously described. In some few cases the Supreme Court possesses original jurisdiction. The Constitution then proceeds thus: "In all the other cases before mentioned the Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction, both as to law and fact, with such exceptions, and under such regulations, as the Congress shall make."
> It is contended that the words of the Constitution vest an appellate jurisdiction in this court, which extends to every case not excepted by Congress; and that if the court had been created without any express definition or limitation of its powers, a full and complete appellate jurisdiction would have vested in it, which must have been exercised in all cases whatever.
> The force of this argument is perceived and admitted. Had the judicial act created the Supreme Court, without defining or limiting its jurisdiction, it must have been considered as possessing all the jurisdiction which the Constitution assigns to it. The Legislature would have exercised the power it possessed of creating a Supreme Court as ordained by the Constitution; and in omitting to exercise the right of excepting from its constitutional powers, would have necessarily left those powers undiminished. The appellate powers of this court are not given by the judicial act. They are given by the Constitution. But they are limited and regulated by the judicial act, and by such other acts as have been passed on the subject.
> When the First Legislature of the Union proceeded to carry the third article of the Constitution into effect, they must be understood as intending to execute the power they possessed of making exceptions to the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court. They have not, indeed, made these exceptions in express terms. They have not declared that the appellate power of the court shall not extend to certain cases; but they have described affirmatively in jurisdiction, and this affirmative description has been understood to imply a negative on the exercise of such appellate power as is not comprehended within it.
> The spirit as well as the letter of a statute must be respected, and where the whole context of the law demonstrates a particular intent in the Legislature to effect a certain object, some degree of implication may be called in to aid that intent.
> It is upon this principle that the court implies a legislative exception from its constitutional appellate power in the legislative affirmative description of those powers. (6 Cranch, 612-614.)

Mr. President, taking that leading case for a guide, there is almost no difficulty in coming to correct conclusions as to the power of Congress in still further affirming the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court by including other cases within it, provided they are cases of a judicial nature.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] seems to have gotten the impression that the bill deals with questions that are merely sentimental, with moral questions, and he put the case in about this form: Suppose the Government of the United States in some of its departments desired to waive the statute of limitations to a suit that some one had the right to bring against the Government, or to claim a demand which some one had the right to bring, and should refer it to a court to take the opinion of that court whether it ought to do it, would I contend, he asked me the question, that that court could take jurisdiction in such a case? I did not answer it then; I listened to what he had to say about it; but the Senator forgot entirely that his question included a matter which is not the subject of judicial action at any time, and particularly under our Government and Constitution, for it is a subject that is altogether within the reach and disposal of the legislative branch of the Government.

In very many cases here, in very many cotton cases, in claims against the United States for a great variety and number of demands, we have waived the statutes of limitation; and it would be impossible to conceive that any one would go to the judicial establishment of the United States for the purpose of getting an opinion upon the duty of Congress to do anything that could be mentioned in the way of legislation. The case that the Senator puts is one which never could get in reach of judicial power because you can not make a judicial inquiry about it.

But that is a very different matter from where some person has a claim against the United States which he asserts as being a claim in equity and justice, or as being a claim well-founded in law, and which he says, "I can prove if you will admit me upon the records as a party and give me the right to prove it. I do not mean to say that I have an actual legal title to this money that I claim from the Government of the United States, but I have a moral right to it, an equitable right to it, and if you will open the doors of your courts and allow the Government to be sued by me, recognizing my right to sue, to present the claim in that forum, then I should be able to establish my case. As the matter stands between the Government of the United States and myself now it is a controversy—a controversy, it is true, in which I admit that I have no legal right, but I have a strong equitable and moral right; and if you will throw your doors open and admit me to a jurisdiction I shall be able to prove that I have such a right, and I shall be able to prove that it is your duty to pay this money." The Government of the United States says: "Very well, if you can prove that, you shall have the money."

Now, that same thing, that conversion of an equitable demand into what we call a legal demand or an absolute and fixed right, occurs in every case almost where a bill in equity is filed, appealing to the equitable powers and jurisdiction of the court for the recognition of an equity which is binding, upon what? Upon the conscience of the Government or the conscience of the defendant. He can not enforce it in law, and the very reason why he comes into equity is that the law affords him no remedy, for if the law does afford him an adequate, complete, and plain remedy he can not get into a court of equity; that bars the jurisdiction. Every case that goes into a court of chancery must have a moral foundation. A person can not invoke the jurisdiction of the chancery court unless the case has a moral foundation, and the man must not only have a case with such a foundation as that, but the laws of the courts of equity require that he in the acquisition of his demand, of whatever nature it may be, has acted with honesty and uprightness, and that he comes into court with clean hands and offers to do full equity to all persons who may participate with him in the right which he is demanding in any form whatsoever.

In the case of Sampeyreac, which I read yesterday, the propositions submitted by both the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Mississippi are answered, and they are answered distinctly and directly. In that case Sampeyreac had no right at all, but he was supposed to have a right. If there had been an actual occupancy by him of a grant under the Spanish Government he would have had a right; but what kind of a right was it? Just the same right that a man has who occupies a Mexican land grant out in Arizona. He has a right to that property which the Government of the United States is not bound to recognize until it has been adjudicated. He has the semblance of a legal right to it; he has a certain assemblage of facts and principles of justice and equity which he can bring together to the attention of a proper tribunal, and there he can have his rights condensed and crystallized until they become actual legal rights. That is the reason why we put a court in operation out there to consider all such equitable demands upon our Government, growing out of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, and have them put in form, as was done in the decree in Sampeyreac's case, so as that the man can get proper muniments and evidences of title for his land.

Not only can the Congress of the United States confer jurisdiction upon the Supreme Court, or rather bring cases within the reach of its jurisdiction, which is the more correct expression, but Congress by its act can take away the jurisdiction in a cause that is pending. Here is the celebrated case of McCardle. That was a case in which a writ of habeas corpus was sued out under an act of Congress which entitled McCardle to go into the courts of the United States and have an inquiry made as to a certain offense that was alleged to have been committed by him, and to be relieved on a writ of habeas corpus. Chief Justice Chase said:

> The first question necessarily is that of jurisdiction; for, if the act of March, 1868, takes away the jurisdiction defined by the act of February, 1867, it is useless, if not improper, to enter into any discussion of other questions.

Are we talking about taking away jurisdiction from the Supreme Court of the United States when Senators and judges all say it is conferred by the Constitution, but that it is under the restriction of Congress, who shall regulate the exercise of it, decide what cases the Supreme Court may take jurisdiction of and determine? It is a power that is vested in Congress to measure the jurisdiction and the method of exercise, which the Constitution confers broadcast upon the Supreme Court of the United States.

> It is quite true, as was argued by the counsel for the petitioner, that the appellate jurisdiction of this court is not derived from acts of Congress. It is, strictly speaking, conferred by the Constitution. But it is conferred "with such exceptions and under such regulations as Congress shall make."

Whenever Congress makes a regulation and makes the exception and brings the case within the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the United States, and it is a question for judicial determination in its nature, then the case is brought rightfully within the jurisdiction of the United States Supreme Court.

> It is unnecessary to consider whether, if Congress had made no exceptions and no regulations, this court might not have exercised general appellate jurisdiction under rules prescribed by itself. For among the earliest acts of the First Congress at its first session was the act of September 24, 1789, to establish the judicial courts of the United States. That act provided for the organization of this court, and prescribed regulations for the exercise of its jurisdiction.
> The source of that jurisdiction and the limitations of it by the Constitution and by statute have been on several occasions subjects of consideration here. In the case of Durousseau vs. The United States, particularly, the whole matter was carefully examined, and the court held that while "the appellate powers of this court are not given by the judiciary act, but are given by the Constitution," they are, nevertheless, "limited and regulated by that act and by such other acts as have been passed on the subject." The court said, further, that the judiciary act was an exercise of the power given by the Constitution to Congress "of making exceptions to the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court." "They have described affirmatively," said the court, "its jurisdiction, and this affirmative description has been understood to imply a negation of the exercise of such appellate power as is not comprehended within it.
> "The principle that the affirmation of appellate jurisdiction implies the negation of all such jurisdiction not affirmed having been thus established, it was an almost necessary consequence that acts of Congress providing for the exercise of jurisdiction should come to be spoken of as acts granting jurisdiction and not as acts making exceptions to the constitutional grant of it.
> "The exception to appellate jurisdiction in the case before us, however, is not an inference from the affirmation of other appellate jurisdiction. It is made in terms. The provision of the act of 1867 affirming the appellate jurisdiction of this court in cases of habeas corpus is expressly repealed. It is hardly possible to imagine a plainer instance of positive exception.
> "We are not at liberty to inquire into the motives of the Legislature. We can only examine into its power under the Constitution; and the power to make exceptions to the appellate jurisdiction of this court is given by express words.
> "What, then, is the effect of the repealing act upon the case before us? We can not doubt as to this. Without jurisdiction the court can not proceed at all in any cause. Jurisdiction is power to declare the law, and when it ceases to exist, the only function remaining to the court is that of announcing the fact and dismissing the cause. And this is not less clear upon authority than upon principle." (Ex parte McCardle, 7 Wallace, 512-514.)

I need not go on to read the appeal of the petitioner. The petition was dismissed. Mr. McCardle had sued out his writ of habeas corpus under an act of Congress that was in force. It was sued out, but Congress repealed it in time to take the case out of the reach of the Supreme Court; and he just had to submit, because there was a case of jurisdiction given by statute, or defined to be provided for by statute, and then that same jurisdiction was taken away pending his cause, and down his case went, and down he went with it.

I have so much respect for the opinions of the two Senators with whom I am conducting the debate upon this question that I have paid very much more attention to this matter than I supposed I would ever be required to do. The Committee on Foreign Relations in framing this bill had the whole matter before them, and it was very fully and very freely discussed. The chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate in the preceding Congress was a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations. The bill came in with his approval and the approval of every other member of the committee, and it has done so time and again.

It is very true that there may be some criticism properly indulged in as to some expressions in the bill, but I think the criticism is more apparent than real. That has resulted, though, from the fact that the bill itself was not the production of a single mind. The bill was prepared and then amendments were incorporated in it, and in that process, as a matter of course, there may have been some little discrepancy between certain lines or parts of the bill which when viewed with a very critical eye might leave some doubt upon the mind as to what was meant in every instance. I am cheerfully willing to have the bill amended in any respect that the Senate may see proper to have it done. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS] has handed me a memorandum of some suggestions which he has made in regard to it which, it seems to me, are very pertinent. I believe he has improved in his suggestion the expression we ought to give to the law when it is enacted through this measure. I shall call attention to that point a little later.

I conclude what I have to say about the law of this case with the remark that the Supreme Court of the United States have settled every question that has heretofore been agitated in these causes through these many long years that they have been pending in this body in one form or another. These parties, with a view to avoid ultimate justice, with a view to escape from the effects of their flagrant outrages upon justice, upon decency, have from time to time resorted to summary proceedings in the nature of writs of mandamus to have what they allege to be their vested, ascertained rights fixed by treaty confirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States, so that the power of the United States Congress would be wanting to break down the confirmation and to get at the true merits of the case.

In every instance they have failed. I suppose that very few cases have been argued with more elaboration and more ability and more zeal than have been presented in the various briefs which have been submitted to the Senate and the Senate committees, to the committees of the other House, and to the courts in this matter. So the whole fields of judicial inquiry and vexation about the right and power of Congress to deal with this subject is entirely cleared up, and no Senator can now suggest a question relating to the rights that are claimed by these people which has not been adjudicated and finally determined by the Supreme Court of the United States. The question that we are now debating, however, is one as to the form of procedure.

I recur to the admission made by the Senator from Mississippi, who is a very able and a very learned lawyer, that we have unquestioned power to confer the jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims which is expressed in this bill. Then I say, if we have the power to confer this jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims it is because it is a question judicial in its nature, or we make it such by our enactment; for it very often happens that questions are made to have a judicial character which according to the ideas and rules prevailing at common law would not be so classified.

It is one of the adjunct powers of the Government of the United States to call into its aid, through the legislation of Congress, the judicial power of the Government to pronounce upon the equity and justice of cases that were not themselves of original judicial cognizance in the courts, treating the courts as deriving their powers from the common law alone, but which are brought within the reach of the power of the courts simply by statutory enactment. Questions are made judicial in that way which otherwise would not be. But this question is not of that character. The essential question here is, who is entitled to this money? Who has the right to it? One answer to that is prominent and unquestionable; that is, the Government of the United States has the right to it. It has the right as against Mexico, because the award was made and Mexico has paid it. That establishes that right, and establishes it conclusively and finally, until we, in our effort to do justice, also to shield our own escutcheon from an imputation of dishonor, see proper to take this money and return it to the government out of which it was filched and robbed by our citizens, with the assistance, of course unconsciously, of our governmental authorities.

There is no doubt about whom the money belongs to. There is still no doubt, as I argued yesterday, that no man can get a claim upon this money of a judicial or legal character until he is aided to it by an act of Congress. The money as much belongs to the Government of the United States as if it had been covered into its Treasury; and there is no reason why it should not have been covered into the Treasury of the United States heretofore as money belonging by this joint conference to the United States, and paid in pursuance thereof by the Government of Mexico.

Therefore, when a demand is set up for it here, not by Mexico, but by those persons who assert that their rights and injuries done to their property were the basis of the claim, the first inquiry that we present to them is this: "Have you any legal right to it? None whatever. The Supreme Court have said twice you have not any right to it. You can not get a right to it except by the act of Congress." We can vote it to them to-day, and no one in the world can appeal from our decision; neither Mexico nor any subsequent Congress can appeal from our decision and take it back.

We can vote it to them without any sort of difficulty, and we can also say to them, "We will appoint officers here to ascertain the question whether in the obtaining of this award, in putting it in that shape where the Government of the United States became entitled to the money, you, using the name of this Government, have by fraud and perjury imposed upon the Government of Mexico;" and when it has been ascertained that those particular awards, which stand there unimpeached in all of their integrity and in the full breadth of their meaning, have been obtained in this way, we say what shall take place? Not that you shall be deprived of some right that you claim, for you have no right at all to be recognized at law or in equity, but that these awards shall not stand for the guidance of the revenue and Treasury officers of the United States to collect this money and cover it into the Treasury; these awards shall be expunged; they shall be held to be null and void.

These difficulties and incumbrances shall be removed. This estate upon which you are trying to fasten a trust, this fund in which you say you have a moral and an equitable right, shall be turned back into the Treasury of the United States or into the treasury of Mexico as Congress determines. In what event now? In the event that one of our judicial tribunals in passing upon this matter gives you the right to sue, and in suing, gives you the right to defend, gives you the right, if you please, to file a crossbill and assert your rights. It gives you the right, by way of answer, to defend against the suit of the United States, and to say that there was no fraud and no perjury in the obtaining of this decree, and thereupon the political power of the country determines, that thing being ascertained in a judicial inquiry, that the money shall be paid to you or it shall go to Mexico.

If the tables were turned here and the question before the Senate was whether we would admit these claimants to sue the United States, no one would ever doubt at all, no one could have a doubt that if the United States was sued under an act of permission of that kind granted by Congress and judgment should go against the Government for the money, an appeal might be taken from that judgment. That result has not any reference to the particular character of the demand except that we recognize by our act of Congress that they have a judicial demand, a demand subject to judicial investigation. We say to these claimants, "Sue us." We can not force them to sue us, but we say, "Sue us; here are the doors of the courts thrown open to your complaint," and make no further provision about it. Get a judgment which Congress, if you please, must make an appropriation for after the judgment is obtained. You get the decree of a court here.

We permit you to sue. Who would deny, after the judgment of a court was pronounced upon one of these claimants in a suit against the United States that the Government of the United States could appeal it to the Supreme Court. It is just the same thing where the claimants refusing to sue, not being willing to bring their cases within the reach of justice, we say to them, "The Government of the United States will sue you in the nature of a bill of interpleader, for instance, in the nature of a bill quia timet, in the nature of a bill to remove clouds from the title, to exercise the repressive powers which courts of equity find at their beck and call whenever they see proper to exercise them in the interest of justice and equity;" and of cases of that kind the books are full.

There is no difficulty about the appeal. Although the defendant may not at the time be setting up and trying to enforce the demand which the complainant wants to smother and put under the ban of a prohibitory injunction or mandatory injunction, the complainant seeing that something would necessarily arise, perhaps after he is in his grave, and come against his children, goes into courts of equity which, without the assistance of a statute even entertain jurisdiction in such causes, for the purpose of getting a mandatory and repressive injunction against a claimant who is in the attitude to set up a claim, and who can do it if he wishes upon a given state of facts, which would, when carried into execution, work injustice to the complainant.

I do not think, Mr. President, that there can be any doubt about this matter. I confess that if there is a doubt about it in the world I have been entirely unable to see it.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator from Alabama allow me a suggestion?

Mr. MORGAN. Certainly.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator has supposed the case of a suit brought by the United States against these claimants who have acquired the title and of controversy to this fund, which I take it would be a case entirely within the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, and he makes no doubt that on such a case being brought the Supreme Court would take jurisdiction of an appeal from the judgment which might be rendered by the lower court. I take it there can be no doubt about that. The Senator argues therefrom conversely that jurisdiction may be given to the Supreme Court to decide the controversy in case the claimants should sue the United States. The Senator supposes that jurisdiction to be given by an express act of Congress such as this.

Now, let me put this case: Suppose, without any legislation whatever being enacted, the La Abra Company should to-day bring suit in the Court of Claims asking for this fund. They aver that the fund is in the Treasury of the United States. They say they have a right to it, and they sue for it in the Court of Claims, and a judgment is rendered in behalf of the claimants. I take it there can be doubt that on appeal the Supreme Court would decide that question. Whether they dismiss the case for want of jurisdiction, or for whatever reason, they deal with the fact that here is a fund, and the claimants sue for it, and the Court of Claims decide that they can have it; and the Supreme Court must, under existing law, have jurisdiction of the appeal.

Mr. MORGAN. There is no question about it.

Mr. CHANDLER. Suppose, on the other hand, that the decision of the Court of Claims is against the claimants, the court deciding that they can not have the fund, are they not to-day, I ask the Senator, entitled to an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, which the Supreme Court must decide for them or against them, and not be thrown out on the ground that it is a question which grows out of a treaty?

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator from New Hampshire is entirely right about it.

Mr. CHANDLER. Could the Supreme Court get rid of deciding the case to-day if these complainants sued?

Mr. MORGAN. If we were to pass a law authorizing these two companies, or either of them, to sue the Government of the United States—of course they can not sue without such a statute or permission—say that unless this suit were brought within one year, whatever claims they might have or set up to this fund should be forever barred, that bar would be good. We do exactly that same thing in our private land-court jurisdiction. We give the claimants to Mexican land grants out there the right to go into that court and prove their claims. We give to that court jurisdiction of boundary questions and jurisdiction of the question of title, and a number of questions which in themselves do not naturally belong to the power of an ordinary court in the country. We give jurisdiction under that act.

Mr. CHANDLER. But we do not give an appeal to the Supreme Court?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, we do.

Mr. CHANDLER. In the land-claim cases?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. CHANDLER. Then of course the argument is very strong which the Senator puts.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes——

Mr. CHANDLER. I wish the Senator would allow me to say one word more, as I have interrupted him.

Mr. MORGAN. Certainly.

Mr. CHANDLER. It is sufficient for me in this case to vote to give a right of appeal in that I find this fund actually in the possession of the United States, and I find a claimant, and I think the right of that claimant to the fund may be made justiciable in the Court of Claims and in the Supreme Court of the United States. I am resting satisfied with those facts, and going no further I do not wish to be understood as saying that I do not think there might be a case such as is supposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], where an attempt should be made to make the Supreme Court decide a political question or a question of foreign relations which the Supreme Court would decline to decide: but I simply say that, looking at the authorities which the Senator from Massachusetts has cited and those which the Senator from Alabama has cited, this case is not one of that sort.

Mr. MORGAN. Oh, no; this is different.

Mr. CHANDLER. It is clearly within the right and privilege of Congress to confer upon any claimants to this fund the right to go into the Court of Claims and recover it if they can on any principles which Congress may choose to lay down; and if the Court of Claims decide against the claimants Congress has the right to ask the Supreme Court in the exercise of a judicial function to review the case on appeal. I have no doubt about it at all.

Mr. MORGAN. That this is a judicial inquiry in the form in which it stands now before the Senate, is established in a great many different ways. Both these judgments of the Supreme Court are based on that idea. The district court in this District granted a judgment against Mr. Blaine for this money in favor of the La Abra Company and ordered him to pay it over. He took an appeal from that to the Supreme Court, and it reversed the decision of the court below and dismissed the motion for a mandamus. There was an ascertainment of a judicial question, and a judgment followed the action brought by these parties against Mr. Blaine.

Mr. CHANDLER. I do not understand that the court refused to do it entirely on the ground that it was a political question.

Mr. MORGAN. The merits of the case were not considered; they were not up. The court took the ground that this was the money of the United States first of all; that nobody had a claim upon it until Congress recognized the claim; and it was therefore subject to the political power—that means the legislative power of Congress—to bestow it or to dispose of it as they saw proper, it being money of the United States.

As I remarked awhile ago, we may ignore every right or claim of anybody in the world and take this fund or appropriate it to any purpose we please, or give it to Mexico if we want to do so, and nobody can object, for it has been ascertained that no person has a fixed, vested legal right in the money. When the circuit court of the United States for the District of Columbia——

Mr. WHITE. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him for one second?

Mr. MORGAN. Certainly.

Mr. WHITE. Does the bill provide that in case the judgment of the Supreme Court should be that the award was not obtained through fraud and perjury then there should be a payment of the award to Weil?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. WHITE. I ask the Senator's pardon; I should like to see the clause of the bill which makes that provision.

Mr. MORGAN. It so provides.

Mr. WHITE. The bill provides in section 4—

That in case it shall be finally adjudged in said cause that the award made by said Mixed Commission, so far as it relates to the claim of Benjamin Weil, was based upon or obtained through fraud or false swearing, or other false and fraudulent practices of said Benjamin Weil, or his assigns, or by their procurement, the President of the United States is hereby authorized to release the Government of Mexico from further payment thereof, to the extent that the same is so declared fraudulent——

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator is not reading from the bill now before the Senate.

Mr. WHITE. I beg the Senator's pardon; the provision is in the last section of that bill.

Mr. MORGAN. The provision is there. I had great doubt about putting it in, but at the same time we did it because, as I have several times observed here, the Congress of the United States does not wish to pass a conclusive judgment upon this whole case. If it did, upon the evidence presented in these two causes we should immediately vote the money to Mexico. There is no question but that we should be obliged to vote it there, out of self respect. But allowing it to go in the form of a judicial inquiry we have attempted to give to the court powers enough to dispose of the property whichever way it may decide the question as to the validity or invalidity of this award, or rather as to its being an award that ought to be set aside.

I shall not detain the Senate any longer upon that view. The case of Weil comes next on the docket. It is not now up for consideration by the Senate, but I am extremely anxious to get this subject before the attention of the Senate and to have it disposed of, and would like to have it done to-day unless some Senator desires to have that case further considered—of course it must be considered separately; but unless some Senator should desire to have it considered by itself, without reference to the case of the La Abra company, having argued the law and a number of the facts, particularly the historical facts which bear upon both these cases, I should like to call the attention of the Senate very briefly to the case of Weil.

I think it is my duty to lay before the Senate a report that was made here within a few days past from the Secretary of State showing the collections that had been made from Mexico on these awards and the disposition that had been made of some parts of those collections. I will submit the entire report as an appendix to my remarks without undertaking to stop to read it, but will call attention to a few of the important features of the report in respect both of the La Abra Silver Mining Company and the Weil case. As we have virtually disposed, in argument, at least on our side, of the La Abra case, I shall not undertake to comment any further upon the payments that have been made out of the different funds to the different individuals who are here mentioned, except merely to call attention to a few of them. These two cases have always hunted in couples; they have always been kept here together, and the array of counsel and lobby in the advocacy of both of them has been a double array. In consequence of that fact there has been a perfect agreement amongst them as to all the proceedings, and it has continued to this day.

Mr. FRYE. I should like to ask the Senator a question there.

Mr. MORGAN. Certainly.

Mr. FRYE. I have forgotten about it, but has any Senator ever defended the award in the Weil case?

Mr. MORGAN. No, I can not say that any Senator has ever defended that award.

Mr. FRYE. I do not recollect myself of ever hearing anyone defend that award.

Mr. MORGAN. I can state very briefly the conclusions of the committee, and they are the conclusions of everybody else who ever studied the subject at all. I shall go on here and give a little résumé of the testimony to show that all these conclusions are correct, adding something to what has been heretofore in the record about it, that the claim of Weil has not any foundation on earth except perjury.

That is a pretty broad remark to make about a claim; but it was conceived in perjury, and fashioned by perjury, and promoted by perjury, and adjudged by perjury, and it has been aided during that time and since that time by bribery and other forms of corruption of a most startling character. It is a claim for 1,900 bales of cotton or thereabouts, alleged to have been bought by Weil in the State of Texas at the close of our war, that had been loaded upon enough wagons of four bales to the wagon to carry it in a caravan, four mules or four oxen to a team, and every bale was said to have been weighed and it weighed over 500 pounds. They make splendid cotton in Texas. If that be true, their presses must be better than they are anywhere else that I know of. They crossed the Rio Grande between Piedras Negras and Laredo at some place where there was no road. They got over on the other side and Cortina, in charge of the Mexican troops at that time, who were then just escaping almost from Maximilian's grasp, captured the cotton and carried it into Matamoros and there confiscated it for the Government of Mexico.

Every word of that statement might have been true, and Weil would have had no right under the laws of the United States, because he was taking the cotton out of the United States in violation of the intercourse law. Every pound of that cotton was subject to confiscation in his hands upon his own statement, at the instance of the Government of the United States. It would have been a perfectly good plea in any court in the United States to-day, if he had a right to sue for it, and could show that there had been such cotton and he had lost it under the circumstances, that his possession of it was in contravention of the laws of the United States and public policy, and that the money, which is the fruit of the cotton, now in the Treasury of the United States belongs only to the Government. That would be a perfect answer to the whole case. But then there was not one lint of cotton, there was not a bale of it, there was not a wagon or a mule or a driver or anything else except Weil and a few perjurers whom he hired and paid from this award very large sums of money to swear his case in court. If this evidence is correct, Weil's own writings and all, there is no foundation on earth for this case except Weil's perjury set forth in an affidavit, or two affidavits, and some supporting affidavits, which are equally false and are shown to be.

I do not intend, however, to allow the case to stand just upon my statement as a member of the committee or upon the judgment of the committee, for every committee that has acted upon it has had the same opinion about it. I shall put into the RECORD some of the evidence upon which I make these assertions. First, in regard to the La Abra case and the Weil case I want to show to whom the money has been paid that has already been realized and expended out of these five installments.

Mr. GEORGE. Five out of how many?

Mr. MORGAN. Thirteen, I think.

Mr. GEORGE. Equal installments?

Mr. MORGAN. Equal installments, or about equal; they vary very little. I do not think the first five varied at all. Two were paid in combination. On the first payment $67,208.60 were paid on the two awards I am speaking of now. Of course the payments by Mexico are very much larger. In the case of Weil the award in Mexican gold was $487,810.68. The first and second payments were $67,208.60.

Check 598. Lambert B. Cain, attorney for Alice Weil, administrator and tutrix, etc., (delivered to Mr. Cain in person), $43,888.16.

Check 599. August 16, 1880. John J. Key, assignee (delivered to him in person), $14,629.38.

Mr. Key is dead, and I have great respect for him and his memory. At the same time he was the attorney in this case, employed to conduct it before the Joint Commission, and he made the affidavit upon which the claim is founded, according to the best of his information, knowledge, and belief. He did not know any more about it than I would know what is going on in Kamchatka to-day. He knew nothing about it; he could not have known anything about it.

Check No. 600, August 16, 1880, Sylvanus C. Boynton, assignee (delivered to him in person), $8,691.06.

Mr. FRYE. Is that the one known as "Poker" Boynton?

Mr. MORGAN. That is "Poker" Boynton. I shall presently read the contract between Boynton and this man Weil in relation to his services. He professed to be an attorney or a lawyer. I do not know whether he is or not. That is the capacity in which he professes to be employed upon this very large share in the award. Those are the first and second payments. The third payment—

Check 279, Lambert B. Cain, attorney for Alice Weil, etc., $22,786.19.
Check 280, John J. Key, assignee, etc., $7,595.39.
Check 281, Sylvanus C. Boynton, assignee, etc., $4,512.10.

Making $34,893.68.

Fourth—

Check 561, August 16, 1880, Lambert B. Cain, attorney for Alice Weil, administratrix and tutrix, etc. (delivered to Mr. Cain in person), $22,786.19.
Check 562, John J. Key, assignee, etc., $7,595.39.
Check 563, Sylvanus C. Boynton, assignee, etc., $4,512.10.

Then follows a list of assignments, giving the date of the respective assignments:

Assignment by Lambert B. Cain, etc., to William W. Boyce of 5 per cent of this award after deducting amount previously assigned to Sylvanus C. Boynton.

Assignment by Lambert B. Cain, attorney, etc., dated, etc., to Robert B. Warden of 6¼ per cent of this award after deducting amounts previously assigned to Sylvanus C. Boynton, John J. Key, and W. W. Boyce.

Assignment by Lambert B. Cain, attorney, etc., to Sanders W. Johnston of 6¼ per cent of this award, after deducting amounts previously assigned to Sylvanus C. Boynton, John J. Key, and W. W. Boyce.

Assignment by Lambert B. Cain, attorney, etc., to Henry E. Davis, administrator of estate of Philip W. Foulke, deceased, 8¼ per cent of this award, after deducting amount previously assigned to Sylvanus C. Boynton.

Assignment by Lambert B. Cain, attorney, etc., to Jacob O. De Castro of 8¼ per cent of this award, after deducting amount previously assigned to Sylvanus C. Boynton.

Now comes the fifth installment:

Check to Sylvanus C. Boynton (delivered to him in person), $4,512.10.
Check to William W. Boyce, $1,519.08.
Check to John J. Key, $7,595.39.
Check to Robert B. Wharton, $1,329.19.
Check to Sanders W. Johnson, $1,329.19.
Check to Jacob O. De Castro, assignee (delivered to him in person), $2,531.80.
Check to Henry E. Davis, administrator of the estate of Philip Foulke, $2,531.80.
Check to Lambert B. Cain, attorney for Alice Weil, administratrix, etc., and tutrix (delivered to Mr Cain in person), $13,545.13.

Then follows a statement of the assignments under which these payments were made.

I will stop here in regard to the Weil case for the purpose of showing how these moneys were paid out. This man Weil, very soon after he committed this perjury, became insane and returned to France, from which country he had come. While he was in Louisiana, however, and before his return to France, his wife was appointed tutrix of his person and property, and she gave a power of attorney to Lambert B. Cain to represent the interests of her husband in this property. Weil died and Cain died, and the general administrator of one of the parishes there in New Orleans took the administration upon the estate of Benjamin Weil, and he called the estate of Lambert B. Cain, who died long since this proceeding has been here before us, to an account in the civil district court of the parish of Orleans.

Mr. Lambert B. Cain, administrator, came in and filed an account of the money that he had received under this award and of the disposal that had been made of it. That is made of record and certified here, together with certain contracts which form a part of the record. However, before the death of Lambert B. Cain, Mr. Weil and Mr. Cain were in a controversy in the courts there, on the equity side, I suppose, of the docket, for an accounting, and various pleadings had been put in and evidence taken to show the state of accounts between Lambert B. Cain and Mrs. Weil as the tutrix of her husband, and after his death as one of his successors. That suit was not determined in the lifetime of Cain, and it became necessary after the common administrator had taken out letters upon his estate that he should proceed in this court for the purpose of calling Lambert B. Cain's administrator to a settlement in regard to these moneys, and here is the account:

Amount cash remitted to Benjamin Weil in Washington, $100.

Then goes on a statement of different items which appear to relate entirely to the current expenses of the administration, amounting to $686.14.

Amounts paid incidental expenses of traveling to Washington and back (memorandum book) $9,743.21.

Without any dates at all, these items go on and are expressed as follows, there being no evidence to whom these moneys were paid: $1,496.25, $1,913.25, $1,675.71, $1,335, $1,285, $538, $1,500, amounting to $9,743.21. "Amounts paid hotel bills in Washington" amounting to $716.75.

Amount paid to Mrs. Alice Weil, $7.

No date given.

Ditto, francs, 2,000, $416.66.

Making $423.66 that this woman got out of of all these awards. That is all she ever got

Mr. FRYE. Weil got $100?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, Weil got $100, but I am talking about his wife, who is tutrix. She got $423.66.

Now, we go further. Amount paid by L. B. Cane, incidental expenses in matter of awarded claim of Benjamin Weil, as per his memorandum book, to wit, $425; ditto, $365; ditto, $295; ditto, $595; ditto, $485; ditto, $425; ditto, $200, making $2,790 in all paid out by him, and he never got anything from Weil's estate except these awards. Incidental-expense account as per memorandum book, $335; ditto, $223; ditto, $406; ditto, $821.27; ditto, $958.72; ditto, $857.27; ditto, $1,214.12; ditto, $453.33; ditto, $2,431.38; ditto, $1,855.13, and he goes on with these dittoes without giving dates or items or anything else. It is "ditto" to the amount of $30,003.68.

Mr. FRYE. That sounds like an old college bill, where all the items are in sundries.

Mr. MORGAN. This is the incidental-expense account in Washington; that is, the lobby money scattered around here.

Mr. CHANDLER. If he paid it out.

Mr. MORGAN. He is claiming credit for it against that estate.

Mr. CHANDLER. It does not follow that he paid it because he claimed it.

Mr. MORGAN. I know. But here is an interesting item. George D. Hite was the chief perjurer in this case. He was the man without whose perjury the case could not have stood on its legs even with Weil's affidavit supporting Mr. Key's affidavit. It was necessary for George D. Hite to come in, not as counsel; he does not pretend here that he is a lawyer; he is a mere good swearer and first-class perjurer. Amount paid George D. Hite, $1,250; ditto, $580; ditto, $341.78; ditto, $603.63; ditto, $340; ditto, $262.89; ditto, $50; ditto, $50; ditto, $20; ditto, $20; ditto, $145.50; ditto, $102.38; ditto, $150; ditto, $100; making in all $4,016.18 paid to George D. Hite. They would not let George's name appear among these assignees, because that would impeach the whole affair, for everybody would know that George D. Hite could not possibly render any assistance to a case of this kind except by hard swearing, and so they kept his name off the record. They come then to the following:

Amount paid Jacob O. De Castro, as per open account, $5,556.70; ditto, extra in Washington, $2,000. That is all that it says about it. Then amounts paid on drafts of Jacob O. De Castro follow right along here till they amount to $2,824.32, "amount paid per following draft," etc.

Amount paid to Emile Landner, his written agreement with Benjamin Weil, $750.

I shall call attention presently to Mr. Landner's contract.

Amount paid P. W. Solomon, demand note of Benjamin Weil held by him—

He is another one of the swearers—$7,500 was paid to that fellow.

Amount paid to Middleton & Co., bankers, of Washington. Demand note for loan made, $824.

Then for telegrams, amount of interest as computed on itemized account, $10,598.68, footing up $84,814.50.

Amount of credit allowed for collections made of various amounts in itemized account, $11,091.51.

He whipsaws them; it cuts both ways. He charges for collection and for paying out.

Amount of interest on same allowed as computed, $2,428.42.

Footing up $13,519.93.

Actual total amount disbursed by Cain before he received a single dollar of the installment as per Tableau in which same is shown how distributed, $71,294.61.

Amount of Cain's one-half share of the $49,011.49 received for the first, second, third, fourth and fifth installments, $24,505.75.

There Cain comes in and claims to be a joint and equal owner with Weil of these various installments. So he credits himself on his account with $24,505.75, the amount that he says he was entitled to out of these five awards, being one-half of Weil's share of them; and that brings the footing of his credit side up to $95,800.36.

Less amount of credit in full for amount received for the first, second, third, fourth, and fifth installments, $49,011.49.
Balance owing Cain, as established on account itemized, $46,788.87.
Balance of account owing estate of L. B. Cain, $46,788.89.
Balance of award not yet paid, half share of same owing to estate of L. B. Cain, as per Tableau, $57,561.43.
Total amount to which the estate of L. B. Cain is entitled, $104,350.30.

Now, we shall presently find out how Cain got to be so deeply interested in the matter. Cain having as he alleged a half ownership in Weil's demand, Weil being crazy, his wife being appointed tutrix, she gives to Cain a power of attorney to make these collections and these settlements, and when she comes to wind up her interest in the estate she get out of it for herself the paltry sum of $423.66.

Then comes a résumé. It is not necessary to go over that, although I will ask that it may be put in the RECORD as it completes the account. The Senate will remember that there is a payment to Philip B. Fouke here of July 15, 1874. That was while this commission was going on or it was just before starting.

Know all men by these presents that I, Benjamin Weil, of the city of New Orleans and State of Louisiana, have nominated, appointed, and substituted, and by these presents do nominate, appoint, and substitute Philip B. Fouke, of Washington City, D. C., my true and lawful attorney for the following purposes, to wit:

Whereas Messrs. Fouke & Key are my attorneys for the prosecution of a certain claim before the joint commission of the United States of America and the United States of Mexico, which said claim is now before said joint commission. Now, in order to defray expenses, fees, and other moneys expended, laid out, or appropriated in and about the prosecution of said claim, I do hereby fully authorize and empower him, the said Philip B. Fouke for me and in my name to pay, pledge, hypothecate any portion of said claim for said purpose, provided, however, the amount thus paid, pledged, or hypothecated shall not exceed the amount and sum of $100,000.

In witness whereof, etc.

Signed by B. Weil. Then there is an affidavit in proof of that exhibit to this proceeding in the court there, certified before a notary public. Then comes the agreement between Fouke as the attorney in fact of Weil and Sylvanus C. Boynton:

This agreement entered into this 5th day of January, A. D. 1875, by and between Benjamin Weil, of the city of New Orleans, State of Louisiana, by Philip B. Fouke, his attorney in fact, for the purposes hereinafter mentioned, and Philip B. Fouke and John J. Key, attorneys at law, of Washington City, D. C., and attorneys of record in the case of said Weil, hereinafter referred to and mentioned, who, with said Weil, are parties of the first part, and Sylvanus C. Boynton, of Washington City, D. C., the party of the second part,

Witnesseth, that the said parties of the first part in consideration of moneys advanced by and of expenses paid by and personal and professional services rendered by the party of the second part to the parties of the first part for the preparation and prosecution of a certain case hereinafter stated, and for the further consideration of the covenants hereinafter mentioned of the party of the second part, do covenant and agree with the said party of the second part to pay him the said party of the second part the sum of $70,000 of the award in a certain case now before and to be adjudged by the Joint Commission of the United States of America and the United States of Mexico, and which ultimately may be before and adjudged by the umpire of said Commission now in session under a treaty between the said Governments made on the 4th day of July, A. D. 1868, to wit: The case of Benjamin Weil (vide docket No. 447), of the city of New Orleans, and State of Louisiana, said claim is for the sum of $335,950, with interest thereon from the 20th of September, A. D. 1864.

And the said party of the second part in consideration of the covenants of the said parties of the first part doth covenant and agree with the said parties of the first part that he will devote his time and attention to said case and to the procuring of an award, giving his personal and professional services in aid and furtherance of said case up to the time such award shall be finally made, or the decision finally be rendered. And the said party of the second part further agrees that should the final award be made for a less sum than said sum of $335,950, with interest from said 20th of September, A. D. 1864, then the party of the second part shall only receive pro rata as to the amount awarded, as $70,000 bears to the whole amount.

And the party of the second part agrees that he will not take any other case or have any interest in any other case pending or which may come before said Commission or umpire thereof, but is to give his entire personal and legal services to prosecutrix to a successful award in the case herein mentioned.

It is agreed by the parties hereto that the party of the second part shall be secured in the amount agreed upon to be paid, and for that purpose the party of the second part shall have a lien on said award for the payment of the same, and the amount herein secured to the party of the second part is to be paid from the proceeds of said award whenever the same shall be paid.

This agreement is to be in full force and effect from the date hereof, but to be null and void if no final award is obtained.

Signed by all these parties.

Mr. CHANDLER. Who was the party of the second part?

Mr. MORGAN. Boynton.

Mr. CHANDLER. Sylvanus C. Boynton?

Mr. MORGAN. Sylvanus C. Boynton. The testimony rested here, but I will read further; perhaps some Senator may know or have heard something about it:

WASHINGTON, D. C., August 20, 1880.

Received of Lambert B. Cain $3,265.08, his proportion of fee charged by me and which is due me now on the first four installments paid by the Secretary of State of the United States in the case of Benjamin Weil against the United States.

THOMAS L. YOUNG.

Now, I come to Mr. Landner, one of the chief swearers in this case—Emile Landner—who has been paid, as I have shown you here, a very large sum of money:

The agreement made, and entered into in the city of New Orleans, and State of Louisiana, between Benjamin Weil of the first part and Emile Landner of the second part, both residents of the city and State before mentioned.

Witnesseth, Benjamin Weil of the first part does hereby agree, pledge, and bind himself, his heirs or assigns, to pay to Emile Landner of the second part (for and in consideration of services rendered by said Emile Landner in the hereinafter-described claim) the sum of $7,500 in United States currency out of the proceeds of the Mexican Claims Commission at Washington, D. C.

This, done in New Orleans, this 16th day of March, 1872, in the presence of the two undersigned competent witnesses—if the amount collected by B. Weil, on the above claim does not exceed the sum of $50,000, the said Emile Landner agrees to accept the sum of $5,000, United States currency.

Attested by Solomon, the witness. Then the balance of this matter is some letters which I shall not detain the Senate to read, but I will ask that they be put in the RECORD, because they explain the account that I have just been going over in the presence of the Senate.

I wish next to call the attention of the Senate for a moment to the evidence upon which this case was tried before the Joint Commission called the Mixed Commission. The first paper in the case was the memorial of Benjamin Weil, residing in the city of New Orleans, etc., setting forth his claim to this property, and the incidents of the robbery which was perpetrated upon him, signed Benjamin Weil, by John J. Key, his attorney in fact, Fouke & Key, solicitors and attorneys for Benjamin Weil:

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, County of Washington, ss:

John J. Key, being first by me duly sworn, says on his oath that he is the attorney in fact of the memorialist described in the foregoing memorial; that the said memorialist is absent from the District of Columbia, and that the facts stated in said memorial are true to the best of his knowledge, information, and belief.

JOHN J. KEY,
Attorney in fact for Benjamin Weil.

Sworn to and subscribed before me, a notary public in and for said county and District, this 25th day of April, A. D. 1870.

[SEAL.] N. CALLAN, Notary Public.

Then there is produced here an affidavit of Weil, sworn to in September, 1869. You will observe that Mr. Key would not have made this claim of the 25th of April, 1870, but in September preceeding that Mr. Weil, it appears, had sworn before a United States commissioner at New Orleans to his claim. It is a very brief statement, nothing like so broad or comprehensive or circumstantial by any means as that which was put forward by Mr. Key, who knew nothing about it.

The next affidavit that is submitted in support of this claim is that of Emile Landner, sworn to on the 15th of December, 1869. That was before Weil had filed his complaint in court. Weil went around and got these affidavits and had them all waiting for his attorneys. His attorney came here in April, 1870, and filed his case and swore to it before this Joint Commission, these affidavits having been sworn to in the preceding fall and winter, September and December. Emile Landner is one of the parties here who received a very large amount of this money according to that account.

The next man who swears is A. J. McCulloch, and then George D. Hite testifies to McCulloch's credibility and veracity, but nobody could ever find McCulloch. Hite, however, swore to his credibility and veracity.

The next man is the chief perjurer, George D. Hite, who was paid a large sum of money by installments along, as I have shown from the accounts I have just read before the Senate.

The next man who swore was John J. Justice. He swore to this account on the 7th of February, 1870, two months before Key filed his memorial. He made a statement before George W. Christy, a notary public.

Then Marcus and Pierre Solomon—they are men who have received money under the distribution of the award here—testified to the credibility of Justice and Christy to that of Solomon.

The next paper in the case is that of John M. Martin. Martin does not appear to have received any money out of this case according to the statement of the account I have just read, but it will appear presently in another form how he did receive money. His deposition was given on the 26th of July, 1870. That was after the case had been commenced in the court.

Then the next is Samuel B. Shackelford. Then George D. Hite comes in with a final and concluding affidavit, in which he fills up all the gaps and provides for all of the difficulties and troubles that had occurred in the discrepancies of the previous witnesses. He swore twice about it, and then he concluded the argument in behalf of the claimants in his affidavit.

Now I wish to turn back to something our Government did with which Mexico had not any connection at all. Our own Government, in ferreting around for frauds and the like of that against the Treasury Department, had a secret service division, and they sent out their examiners, their secret service men. One of them came across this Weil matter in New Orleans. It was ripening up and they were getting the evidence about it, and he struck the trail of it. It interested him very much, and he went on to examine all about it. He made his reports from time to time to the Treasury Department. There they remained a good many years, and finally, on the 9th of December, 1881, Mr. Blaine sent these papers, certified to by Mr. Folger, who was then Secretary of the Treasury, to Mr. Zamacona, the Mexican minister, and said this:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, December 9, 1881.

SIR: I regret to find that I have overlooked until quite recently your note of the 12th of May last, in reference to the case of Benjamin Weil. The events of the past summer and autumn may, however, explain, if not excuse, this continued oversight.

In the note you refer to and ask for copies of certain papers ascertained by you to be of record in the Treasury Department among the settlements of the awards of the Southern Claims Commission, and among the files of the secret service division, these papers being:

First. An affidavit of John M. Martin—

He is one of the chief swearers in this case—

in favor of a claim before the Southern Claims Commission, in which the affiant details his movements and residence from April 1, 1861, until April 13, 1865.

Secondly. Certain reports made to the Treasury Department during the last three years by Mr. A. F. Wild, a secret agent, to the effect that John M. Martin confessed to him the fraudulency of the Weil claim, and had proposed to him (Wild) to negotiate with the minister of Mexico to expose the fraud.

In response to your request, I now have pleasure in sending to you herewith copies of the papers you describe. And in transmitting them, permit me to say that this Government can have no less moral interest than that of Mexico in probing any allegation of fraud whereby the good faith of both in a common transaction may have been imposed upon.

I beg, etc.

JAMES G. BLAINE.

I hope, Mr. President, that the Senate will indulge me to put this report into the RECORD. It is not very voluminous, but it is a very important part of the testimony.

Mr. DOLPH. Is it the report of the secret agent?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, down to page 638, where it ends.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The matter referred to by the Senator from Alabama will be inserted, in the absence of objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[Inclosure in No. 44.]

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, November 30, 1881.

Pursuant to section 882 of the Revised Statutes, I hereby certify that the annexed are true extract copies from the original papers on file in this Department.

In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand, and caused the seal of the Treasury Department to be affixed on the day and year first above written.

[SEAL.] CHAS. J. FOLGER,
Secretary of the Treasury.

JOHN MILLER MARTIN }
vs. } No. —.
UNITED STATES. }
Before Claims Commission.

Be it remembered that on the 28th day of December, A. D. 1871, and the adjourned day, before me, William Grant, United States commissioner for the district of Louisiana, and special commissioner, personally appeared the claimant and his witness, Daniel W. Shaw, who, being duly sworn according to law to tell the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth relative to this claim, did depose as follows, each being examined out of the presence of the other; present, Dr. H. Porter for claimant:

Deposition of Daniel W. Shaw, a witness called and sworn for the claimant.

I, Daniel W. Shaw, do hereby testify that the claimant is, and always has been, a loyal citizen.

I was living within a few miles of claimant when the property described in his petition was taken; 1,000 barrels of corn, worth $2.50 per barrel; a large flock of sheep, worth $2.50 per head; also, a large lot of hogs, worth $5 per head. I do not know the exact number of either sheep or hogs that was taken, but think there were at least as many as is charged for in claimant's petition. These were all taken by the United States soldiers and carried to Alexandria, where the United States Army was encamped, and, I presume, used by said Army.

D. W. SHAW.

Sworn to before me December 28, 1871.

WM. GRANT,

Deposition of D. W. Shaw, a witness called and sworn for claimant.

To the interrogatories he answers as follows:

To the 1st he saith: I was.

To the 2d: I saw them all taken.

To the 4th: They were taken by United States soldiers in March, 1864, from the plantation of G. W. Compton, where the claimant was then residing.

To the 5th: Capt. Martin and myself are the only ones whose names I remember.

To the 6th: There was a lieutenant present who, I think, ordered the taking, but I do not know his name or rank; he belonged to Gen. Banks's command.

To the 7th: The soldiers took the corn off in wagons, and drove the sheep and hogs.

To the 9th: It was taken off in the direction of Alexandria; I did not follow it, but was told it went there.

To the 10th: I suppose all the property taken was used by the United States Army.

To the 11th: Not that I know of.

To the 12th: I do not know of any voucher or receipt having been asked for, nor was any given that I know of.

To the 13th: None of the property was taken secretly; it was all taken in the afternoon.

To the 14th: Gen. Banks's army was encamped in and around Alexandria, the nearest camp being about two miles and an half from the place where the property was taken from. It had been encamped there about fifteen or twenty days. They remained there in all about six or eight weeks. There had been no battle or skirmish before the taking of the property. I knew none of the officers of the army.

To the 15th: The corn had been harvested, was well ripened, and was in the crib, and hogs were in very good condition. The sheep were worth about two and an half dollars per head, and the hogs worth $5 a head. I have not talked to the claimant about their value until to-day. The corn was worth at least two and an half dollars per barrel. It, the property, was all taken by the United States Army about March, 1864.

To the 16th: It was all taken in my presence, and I suppose there was at least one thousand barrels of corn, about fifty hogs, and about one hundred sheep. I have handled corn myself, and am a good judge of quantity.

To the 19th: I suppose it was taken for the use of the Army.

To the 20th and the 21st: He answers, he does not know.

To the 22d: I think so.

To the 23d: I think it was taken by order issuing from some officer properly empowered.

D. W. SHAW.

Sworn before me December 8, 1871.

WM. GRANT,
Special Commissioner.

Adjourned to Saturday, the 30th of December, 1871.

Deposition of John Miller Martin, claimant, called and sworn for himself.

I, the claimant, am 47 years old, and reside in New Orleans, La. In March, 1864, I was residing on G. W. Compton's plantation, which is situated in Bayou Rapides, about 5 miles from Alexandria. During a short absence from home in the latter part of said month, and about a week subsequent to the taking by the United States authorities of my eleven mules and nine horses, some of the soldiers who were encamped in the neighborhood entered the said place and took from it about one thousand barrels of corn, one hundred head of sheep, and between fifty or sixty head of hogs. I never received either receipt or money for the property thus taken.

JOHN M. MARTIN.

Sworn to December 30, 1871.

WM. GRANT, Special Commissioner.

Deposition of John Miller Martin, claimant, called and sworn for himself.

The interrogatories propounded him he answered as follows:

To the first he says: My residence was on the plantation of G. W. Compton from the 1st of April, 1861, to the 28th of April, 1864, where I was personally engaged farming until about the 16th of March, 1864, when I offered my services to Admiral Porter; he employed me as a pilot, and I was thus engaged until about the 28th of April, 1864. I then went to New Orleans, remained there about one month, then went to Belmont County, Ohio, where I remained until the 13th of April, 1865, when I returned to New Orleans. On or about the 25th of April, 1864, my entire place was burned.

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 15, 1865.

In constructing the defense of Alexandria, La., while held by the Army, for the purpose of building a dam, buildings within rifle-shot of the line of intrenchments which might under any circumstances serve as a cover for the enemy were leveled by general orders. This was indispensable to the safety of the Army and the fleet. Whether the property of Capt. Martin was within this line, or whether his buildings were destroyed under this order, or were within range of the fleet lying above the rapids, I can not say; this can easily be ascertained by measurement or by evidence.

Capt. Martin is a loyal citizen, a man of integrity and character, and deserves well of the Government on account of service as well as character.

N. P. BANKS, M. G. V.

(Indorsed:) Exhibit A. William Grant, special commissioner.

3. By order of Gen. N. P. Banks, from military necessity, as will be more fully seen by reference to a copy of a certificate given to me by Gen. Banks, which I also offer as proof of my loyalty. Said copy is hereto annexed, and marked A.

To the interrogatories from the 3d to the 14th, inclusive, he answers: No.

To the 15th: On the 28th of April, 1864, I left Alexandria and came to New Orleans on the steamboat Meteor, a transport of Admiral Porter's fleet, and I did not return to my plantation, or, rather, the plantation upon which I resided, until after the surrender. During said absence I was not engaged in business of any kind.

To the 16th: From 1861 to the date of the fall of the city of New Orleans I was employed as a pilot on the steamboat Homer, said boat being engaged in civil trade between New Orleans and Shreveport, La.

To the 17th and 18th he answers: No.

To the 19th: None, except that the Confederates tried to force me into their service.

To the 20th he says: No.

To the 21st: Nothing, except my services, which I offered to Admiral Porter upon his arrival at Alexandria, in May, 1863, and in March, 1864. I also gave Capt. W. R. Hoel, commander of the United States gunboat Benton, information in regard to the whereabouts of the so-called Confederate fleet.

To the 22d: Nothing, except what I have stated in my previous answers. As soon as the United States authorities arrived in my region of the country I offered them my services, which was all that I could do.

To the 23d: I had three brothers in the Union army, but no relations in the Confederate army. In 1865—the spring thereof—I took one of my brothers, who was sick in the hospital at the time, to Ohio with my family where he remained until he recovered. That was all the assistance I ever rendered any of them.

To the interrogatories from the 24th to the 31st, inclusive, he answers: No.

To the 32d: I took the ironclad oath at New Orleans about June, 1864, in order to procure permission to go to Ohio. I have not held any office under the United States Government since the war.

To the 33d: My sympathies, feelings, language, and influence have always been with the Union cause. I did not vote at all, either at the beginning of hostilities or during the war. I adhered to the Union cause even after the adoption of the ordinance of secession by my State.

To the 34th: I do solemnly swear that from the beginning of hostilities against the United States to the end thereof my sympathies were constantly with the cause of the United States: that I never, with my own free will and accord, did anything, or offered or sought, or attempted to do anything by word or deed to injure said cause or retard its success, and that I was at all times ready and willing, when called upon, to aid and assist the cause of the Union, or its supporters, so far as my means and power and the circumstances of the case permitted.

JOHN M. MARTIN.

Sworn to before me, December 30, 1871.

WM. GRANT, Special Com.

To the second series of interrogatories the claimant answers as follows:

To the 1st he saith: I was not. I was with Porter's fleet.

To the 2d: No.

To the 6th: Not being present, I do not know.

To the 8th: My wife and daughter, who were both present upon the occasion of the taking, told me that the soldiers drove the sheep and hogs off, and hauled the corn off in wagons.

To the 9th: I have heard that all the property taken was carried to Alexandria.

To the 10th: I have heard and believe that the property taken was used by the army which was encamped in and around Alexandria.

To the 11th and 12th: No complaint was made, nor was any receipt or voucher asked for.

To the 13th: None of the property was taken secretly. I was told that it was all taken about midday.

To the 14th: General Banks's entire army was encamped in and around Alexandria, the nearest camp being about two miles and a half from the plantation from which the property was taken. It had been encamped there about five or eight days, and remained until about the 1st of April, 1864. There had been no battle nor skirmish near there before the property was taken. I did not know any of the officers of the army.

To the 15th: There was corn in good condition, well ripened, dry, and unhusked, but stored in a crib. It could not have been purchased at the time when taken for less than two dollars and a half per barrel. The sheep and hogs were all in good condition, and worth at least—hogs $5, sheep two and a half dollars per head. Indeed, none of the articles specified could have been purchased anywhere in the neighborhood for the price I have charged in my petition.

To the 16th: I judge of quantity taken from what my wife and daughter told me, and from the fact that I knew what I had left on the place just before I started up Red River with Porter's fleet.

To the 19th: I do believe that the property specified was taken for the actual use of the army, and not for the mere gratification of individual officers or soldiers.

To the 20th: I believe the army at that time required fresh food.

To the 21st: I believe the want for the articles taken was so urgent as to justify the soldiers in such taking.

To the 22d: I think so.

To the 23d: I do believe that the property specified was taken by order of some officer who was properly empowered to issue such order.

I hereunto annex as proof of my loyalty document marked B.

JOHN M. MARTIN.

Sworn to before me, December 30, 1871.

WM. GRANT,
Special Commissioner.

I hereby certify that the foregoing fifteen pages of depositions were taken in my presence and reduced to writing by my clerk, and carefully read over to the claimant and witness and by them signed at the time, place, and in the manner stated in the caption sheet hereof.

Given under my hand and official seal, at New Orleans, La., this 30th day of December, 1871.

WILLIAM GRANT.
United States Commissioner and Special Commissioner.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, December 3, 1881.

Pursuant to section 882 of the Revised Statutes, I hereby certify that the annexed is a true copy of an original paper on file in this Department.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the Treasury Department to be affixed, on the day and year first above written.

CHAS. J. FOLGER,
Secretary of the Treasury.

Extracts from the reports of Ofr. Azariah F. Wild, New Orleans, La., in matter of Benjamin Weil.

SEPTEMBER 17, 1877.

Being detained here waiting the return of the United States attorney, I improved the opportunity to commence writing my report in the case of Benjamin Weil vs. Mexico for 500 bales of cotton which Weil claims was taken from him by the Mexican authorities in the year 1864, while en route to Matamoras, Mexico, and for which an award has been allowed of about $500,000, and as I am informed not yet paid, but has been brought to the notice of Congress, and is now pending before a committee of the Senate.

My connections with this case were those of a clerk, and commenced about the month of May, 1876, and so continued until about the time Judge M. A. Dooley left Louisiana to reside, and I became employed by the United States Treasury Department, when I refused to have anything further to do with the case, although have been pressed to do so by both sides, on one side to continue in the case and take it up where Judge Dooley left it, and by the other side to give my affidavit of what I knew about the case, to be used before a Congressional committee, both of which I refused.

First. I could not work in any case except for the Government.

Second. I did not feel at liberty to make an affidavit of what information I gained by being a confidential clerk of Judge Dooley's, a sworn attorney.

My reasons thus expressed to Gen. Slaughter caused him to say that, unless he could have my affidavit, he would have me brought to Washington to testify.

I now will state the case, and the way in which I became engaged in it, and will forward copies of some twenty letters now under my control at an early day.

John M. Martin, an old steamboat captain, residing in New Orleans, met me at the corner of Canal and St. Charles streets in the month of May, 1876, and asked me to introduce him to Col. Brooks (now chief of secret service division); I replied I could not unless he had business. He (Martin) said he had business; that he had the cotton rolls of ex-Confederate Agent McKee, of the transmississippi department, which would be of value to the Government, and that he (Martin) wanted to see Col. Brooks and try and sell them to the Government through him (Brooks), and if agreeable to him would have a time set when we could meet and examine the rolls, etc.

I saw Col. Brooks; an appointment was made to be held at his (Brooks') room, No. 146 Carondelet street. I notified Capt. Martin, and we met at place designated, and the rolls were examined by Col. Brooks. Soon after Col. Brooks left for Washington, and Martin says left him to understand he would submit the matter to the Treasury Department and let him (Martin) know if the Department wanted them. Col. Brooks had been gone but a few days when Capt. Martin made daily calls at the office of Judge Dooley, in whose office I occupied a desk, and asked if anything had been heard from Col. Brooks.

After waiting several weeks he persuaded Judge Dooley to dictate a letter to the Attorney-General, and I wrote it, to which Mr. Taft replied that the Government had the rolls of which his letter spoke, etc. Capt. Martin, after hearing his rolls were not wanted, said:

"I have a big case, in which there is some money in. Will you take it judge?"

Judge Dooley replied that he would not take a case until he knew what it was. Capt. Martin then replied that he would tell some time, but would tell Wild first, and Wild might explain the case to him (Dooley). When Capt. Martin started out he called me and asked me to put on my hat. We went to Hugo Ralwitz's saloon, on Common street, when he made me pledge myself to keep the matter private, and he would show me the whole case, and that he would give Judge Dooley and myself a chance to make "a file," as he called it. He commenced by asking if I had ever heard of the Benjamin Weil cotton claim for a large lot of cotton captured by the Mexicans in the year 1864, and that the claim was brought before the Mixed Commission, and that they had made an award amounting to over $500,000. I said no, I had never heard a word of it.

Martin said: "I tell you the truth; the claim is all a fraud, and Weil never lost a single pound of cotton, and I can furnish the evidence to defeat the claim, and this is what I want you and Judge Dooley to do; that is, I want you to talk to the judge and see if he will take hold of the case, and if he will, I will bring in some letters that have been written by John T. Michel, of this city, when I come, and the answers to them written by the Mexican minister, Ignacio Mariscal."

I consulted with Judge Dooley, and he said, "If the case is as he (Martin) has represented it to you, to be a fraud, and it can be shown as such, and the Mexican Government will pay, I will take hold of it." I told Martin what Judge Dooley said, and in one or two days Martin came in and brought along two letters written, or purporting to have been written, by John T. Michel, of New Orleans, to the Mexican minister (Ignacio Mariscal) at Washington, with two letters from the Mexican minister to John T. Michel, of New Orleans, La., in answer to those written by him (Michel).

The judge then took from Capt. Martin the four letters, and called upon Mr. Avendano, the Mexican consul at New Orleans, and showed them to him, who, after reading them, said he knew the claim to be a fraud, and had so reported it to his Government, which was all that he could do in the case; but would give Judge Dooley a letter recommending him to his minister, Mr. Mariscal, if he desired, to which Judge Dooley consented, and left. One or two days after, Mr. Avendano sent a note to Judge Dooley that he had written and mailed a letter recommending him, and that he could then correspond direct with his minister at Washington.

On this information Judge Dooley commenced his correspondence in this case by first writing to the minister, who, in response, among other things, said a confidential agent would soon call on him, in New Orleans, who would show him (Dooley) copies of his (Dooley's) letters, which would be evidence that he was in good standing with his Goverernment, and was to be trusted, etc.

In a few days, Gen. Slaughter, of Mobile, Ala., called and presented not only Judge Dooley's letters, but copies of the evidence in the case. It seems that Gen. Slaughter had made an agreement for a large percentage of the claim to get such evidence as would reverse the decision already made by Sir Edward Thornton, and that said Slaughter wanted Judge Dooley to give up all the information he had, or might obtain, to him (Slaughter) without consideration, to which Judge Dooley would not consent after consultation with Capt. Martin.

It now became clear that Capt. John M. Martin and George D. Hite, of New Orleans, were the principal witnesses in the case on which the award is based, and when I came down on Martin with the direct question, "Did you not testify in the Weil case in support of the claim?" he replied, "I did." I then said: "You have placed yourself in a very bad light in the case;" that Judge Dooley had got mad; that he did not fully explain the case at the start. He then said he would give me the whole case, just as it was, from the beginning to the end, and started out by saying that he knew Benjamin Weil; that Weil wanted him to testify in the case, and also get one or two other witnesses, if he could; that he also knew George D. Hite well, and that he and Hite made a verbal agreement with Benjamin Weil to testify in the case and what to swear to, and that if the claim went through, as it must, they were each to have the sum of $10,000 out of the award; that they all trusted to each other's word in the matter and never had a written agreement; that about the time the claim was allowed Benjamin Weil was taken crazy and sent to an insane asylum in France. This frightened Martin and Hite, and they turned tail to the claimant and commenced to feel of the other side by writing the letters heretofore spoken of as those of John T. Michel.

George D. Hite has not been to see me, and I have refused to call on him since the case has turned out as it has, but Martin tells me that he and Hite are one in the transaction, and neither he or Hite could move without the consent of the other. Since I have refused to act in the case for Martin and Hite, I am reliably informed that Martin has got up or caused to be written two letters and their answers, purporting to be from him to the Mexican minister at Washington, and his reply to them, offering a large percentage of the claim in case of defeat for such evidence as will bring it about. These letters are gotten up in New Orleans, sent to a friend of Martin's at Washington, and then remailed at New Orleans with the Mexican minister's name forged to those which purport to be in answer to Martin, and he (Martin) is to take these to one Kain (a Jew), who is now the principal owner in the claim, and say to him, "Come down, or I will expose the claim."

I asked Martin which story the Commission were to believe, the one he had already sworn to, or the one which he wanted to swear to for a consideration. He replied: "Neither George D. Hite nor myself were anywhere near the place we swore to in that testimony at the time we swore we were, and in case the parties will come down handsomely will produce documents to show it."

SEPTEMBER 26, 1877.

Please find inclosed herewith copies of correspondence in the case of Benjamin Weil vs. Mexico, which I mentioned in my report of September 17, 1877.

1. Letter from John T. Michel to Ignacius Mariscal, Mexican minister, dated New Orleans, January 26, 1876.
2. Letter from Mexican minister to John T. Michel, dated at Washington, February 3, 1876.
3. Letter from John T. Michel to Mexican minister, dated New Orleans, February 9, 1876.
4. Letter from Mexican minister to John T. Michel, dated Washington, February 21, 1876.
5. Letter from L. W. Avonduno, Mexican consul at New Orleans, dated June 3, 1876, to M. A. Dooley.
6. Letter from M. A. Dooley to Sgn. Mariscal, dated New Orleans, June 4, 1876.
7. Letter from Sgn. Mariscal to M. A. Dooley, dated New York, June 8, 1876.
8. Letter from M. A. Dooley to Sgn. Mariscal, dated New Orleans, June 13, 1876.
9. Letter from M. A. Dooley to Sgn. Mariscal, dated New Orleans, June 19, 1876.
10. Letter from Sgn. Mariscal to M. A. Dooley, dated New York, June 22, 1876.
11. Letter from M. A. Dooley to Sgn. Mariscal, dated New Orleans, June 26, 1876.
12. Letter from M. A. Dooley to Sgn. Mariscal, dated New Orleans, June 28, 1876.
13. Letter from M. A. Dooley to Zamacona, dated New Orleans, August 5, 1876.
14. Letter from M. A. Dooley to E. Aveta, dated New Orleans, August 24, 1876.
15. Letter from M. A. Dooley to E. Aveta, dated New Orleans, September 4, 1876.
16. Letter from James E. Slaughter to M. A. Dooley, dated Mobile, August 11, 1877.
17. Copy of affidavit made by John M. Martin, alias Michel, in support of Benjamin Weil's claim against Mexico, dated New Orleans, July 25, 1870.

I would respectfully state that these copies are all in my handwriting and were prepared under the direction of Judge M. A. Dooley, late of New Orleans (now San Saba County, Tex.), to forward to the President of Mexico, but owing to the disturbed condition of the Mexican Government they were not sent, and when Judge Dooley left Louisiana he left them here. Those written by Judge Dooley, or purporting to have come from him, to the Mexican officials are in their possession, but those received here by Judge Dooley from them are still here in Louisiana, and can be got, if they are wanted, by little trouble.

struck the trail of it. It interested him very much, and he went on to examine all about it. He made his reports from time to time to the Treasury Department. There they remained a good many years, and finally, on the 9th of December, 1881, Mr. Blaine sent these papers, certified to by Mr. Folger, who was then Secretary of the Treasury, to Mr. Zamacona, the Mexican minister, and said this:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, December 9, 1881.

SIR: I regret to find that I have overlooked until quite recently your note of the 12th of May last, in reference to the case of Benjamin Weil. The events of the past summer and autumn may, however, explain, if not excuse, this continued oversight.

In the note you refer to and ask for copies of certain papers ascertained by you to be of record in the Treasury Department among the settlements of the awards of the Southern Claims Commission, and among the files of the secret service division, these papers being:

First. An affidavit of John M. Martin—

He is one of the chief swearers in this case—

in favor of a claim before the Southern Claims Commission, in which the affiant details his movements and residence from April 1, 1861, until April 13, 1865.

Secondly. Certain reports made to the Treasury Department during the last three years by Mr. A. F. Wild, a secret agent, to the effect that John M. Martin confessed to him the fraudulency of the Weil claim, and had proposed to him (Wild) to negotiate with the minister of Mexico to expose the fraud.

In response to your request, I now have pleasure in sending to you herewith copies of the papers you describe. And in transmitting them, permit me to say that this Government can have no less moral interest than that of Mexico in probing any allegation of fraud whereby the good faith of both in a common transaction may have been imposed upon.

I beg, etc.

JAMES G. BLAINE.

I hope, Mr. President, that the Senate will indulge me to put this report into the RECORD. It is not very voluminous, but it is a very important part of the testimony.

Mr. DOLPH. Is it the report of the secret agent?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, down to page 638, where it ends.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The matter referred to by the Senator from Alabama will be inserted, in the absence of objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[Inclosure in No. 44.]

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, November 30, 1881.

Pursuant to section 882 of the Revised Statutes, I hereby certify that the annexed are true extract copies from the original papers on file in this Department.

In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand, and caused the seal of the Treasury Department to be affixed on the day and year first above written.

Secretary of the Treasury.

JOHN MILLER MARTIN }
vs. } No. —.
UNITED STATES. }

Before Claims Commission.

Be it remembered that on the 28th day of December, A. D. 1871, and the adjourned day, before me, William Grant, United States commissioner for the district of Louisiana, and special commissioner, personally appeared the claimant and his witness, Daniel W. Shaw, who, being duly sworn according to law to tell the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth relative to this claim, did depose as follows, each being examined out of the presence of the other; present, Dr. H. Porter for claimant:

Deposition of Daniel W. Shaw, a witness called and sworn for the claimant.

I, Daniel W. Shaw, do hereby testify that the claimant is, and always has been, a loyal citizen.

I was living within a few miles of claimant when the property described in his petition was taken; 1,000 barrels of corn, worth $2.50 per barrel; a large flock of sheep, worth $2.50 per head; also, a large lot of hogs, worth $5 per head. I do not know the exact number of either sheep or hogs that was taken, but think there were at least as many as is charged for in claimant's petition. These were all taken by the United States soldiers and carried to Alexandria, where the United States Army was encamped, and, I presume, used by said Army.

D. W. SHAW.

Sworn to before me December 28, 1871.

WM. GRANT,

Deposition of D. W. Shaw, a witness called and sworn for claimant.

To the interrogatories he answers as follows:

To the 1st he saith: I was.

To the 2d: I saw them all taken.

To the 4th: They were taken by United States soldiers in March, 1864, from the plantation of G. W. Compton, where the claimant was then residing.

To the 5th: Capt. Martin and myself are the only ones whose names I remember.

To the 6th: There was a lieutenant present who, I think, ordered the taking, but I do not know his name or rank; he belonged to Gen. Banks's command.

To the 7th: The soldiers took the corn off in wagons, and drove the sheep and hogs.

To the 9th: It was taken off in the direction of Alexandria; I did not follow it, but was told it went there.

To the 10th: I suppose all the property taken was used by the United States Army.

To the 11th: Not that I know of.

To the 12th: I do not know of any voucher or receipt having been asked for, nor was any given that I know of.

To the 13th: None of the property was taken secretly; it was all taken in the afternoon.

To the 14th: Gen. Banks's army was encamped in and around Alexandria, the nearest camp being about two miles and an half from the place where the property was taken from. It had been encamped there about fifteen or twenty days. They remained there in all about six or eight weeks. There had been no battle or skirmish before the taking of the property. I knew none of the officers of the army.

To the 15th: The corn had been harvested, was well ripened, and was in the crib, and hogs were in very good condition. The sheep were worth about two and an half dollars per head, and the hogs worth $5 a head. I have not talked to the claimant about their value until to-day. The corn was worth at least two and an half dollars per barrel. It, the property, was all taken by the United States Army about March, 1864.

To the 16th: It was all taken in my presence, and I suppose there was at least one thousand barrels of corn, about fifty hogs, and about one hundred sheep. I have handled corn myself, and am a good judge of quantity.

To the 19th: I suppose it was taken for the use of the Army.

To the 20th and the 21st: He answers, he does not know.

To the 22d: I think so.

To the 23d: I think it was taken by order issuing from some officer properly empowered.

D. W. SHAW.

Sworn before me December 8, 1871.

WM. GRANT,
Special Commissioner.

Adjourned to Saturday, the 30th of December, 1871.

Deposition of John Miller Martin, claimant, called and sworn for himself.

I, the claimant, am 47 years old, and reside in New Orleans, La. In March, 1864, I was residing on G. W. Compton's plantation, which is situated in Bayou Rapides, about 5 miles from Alexandria. During a short absence from home in the latter part of said month, and about a week subsequent to the taking by the United States authorities of my eleven mules and nine horses, some of the soldiers who were encamped in the neighborhood entered the said place and took from it about one thousand barrels of corn, one hundred head of sheep, and between fifty or sixty head of hogs. I never received either receipt or money for the property thus taken.

JOHN M. MARTIN.

Sworn to December 30, 1871.

WM. GRANT, Special Commissioner.

Deposition of John Miller Martin, claimant, called and sworn for himself.

The interrogatories propounded him he answered as follows:

To the first he says: My residence was on the plantation of G. W. Compton from the 1st of April, 1861, to the 28th of April, 1864, where I was personally engaged farming until about the 16th of March, 1864, when I offered my services to Admiral Porter; he employed me as a pilot, and I was thus engaged until about the 28th of April, 1864. I then went to New Orleans, remained there about one month, then went to Belmont County, Ohio, where I remained until the 13th of April, 1865, when I returned to New Orleans. On or about the 25th of April, 1864, my entire place was burned.

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 15, 1866.

In constructing the defense of Alexandria, La., while held by the Army, for the purpose of building a dam, buildings within rifle-shot of the line of intrenchments which might under any circumstances serve as a cover for the enemy were leveled by general orders. This was indispensable to the safety of the Army and the fleet. Whether the property of Capt. Martin was within this line, or whether his buildings were destroyed under this order, or were within range of the fleet lying above the rapids, I can not say; this can easily be ascertained by measurement or by evidence.

Capt. Martin is a loyal citizen, a man of integrity and character, and deserves well of the Government on account of service as well as character.

N. P. BANKS, M. G. V.

(Indorsed:) Exhibit A. William Grant, special commissioner.

3. By order of Gen. N. P. Banks, from military necessity, as will be more fully seen by reference to a copy of a certificate given to me by Gen. Banks, which I also offer as proof of my loyalty. Said copy is hereto annexed, and marked A.

To the interrogatories from the 3d to the 14th, inclusive, he answers: No.

To the 15th: On the 28th of April, 1864, I left Alexandria and came to New Orleans on the steamboat Meteor, a transport of Admiral Porter's fleet, and I did not return to my plantation, or, rather, the plantation upon which I resided, until after the surrender. During said absence I was not engaged in business of any kind.

To the 16th: From 1861 to the date of the fall of the city of New Orleans I was employed as a pilot on the steamboat Homer, said boat being engaged in civil trade between New Orleans and Shreveport, La.

To the 17th and 18th he answers: No.

To the 19th: None, except that the Confederates tried to force me into their service.

To the 20th he says: No.

To the 21st: Nothing, except my services, which I offered to Admiral Porter upon his arrival at Alexandria, in May, 1863, and in March, 1864. I also gave Capt. W. R. Hoel, commander of the United States gunboat Benton, information in regard to the whereabouts of the so-called Confederate fleet.

To the 22d: Nothing, except what I have stated in my previous answers. As soon as the United States authorities arrived in my region of the country I offered them my services, which was all that I could do.

To the 23d: I had three brothers in the Union army, but no relations in the Confederate army. In 1865—the spring thereof—I took one of my brothers, who was sick in the hospital at the time, to Ohio with my family where he remained until he recovered. That was all the assistance I ever rendered any of them.

To the interrogatories from the 24th to the 31st, inclusive, he answers: No.

To the 32d: I took the ironclad oath at New Orleans about June, 1864, in order to procure permission to go to Ohio. I have not held any office under the United States Government since the war.

To the 33d: My sympathies, feelings, language, and influence have always been with the Union cause. I did not vote at all, either at the beginning of hostilities or during the war. I adhered to the Union cause even after the adoption of the ordinance of secession by my State.

To the 34th: I do solemnly swear that from the beginning of hostilities against the United States to the end thereof my sympathies were constantly with the cause of the United States; that I never, with my own free will and accord, did anything, or offered or sought, or attempted to do anything by word or deed to injure said cause or retard its success, and that I was at all times ready and willing, when called upon, to aid and assist the cause of the Union, or its supporters, so far as my means and power and the circumstances of the case permitted.

JOHN M. MARTIN.

Sworn to before me, December 30, 1871.

WM. GRANT, Special Com.

To the second series of interrogatories the claimant answers as follows:

To the 1st he saith: I was not. I was with Porter's fleet.

To the 2d: No.

To the 6th: Not being present, I do not know.

To the 8th: My wife and daughter, who were both present upon the occasion of the taking, told me that the soldiers drove the sheep and hogs off, and hauled the corn off in wagons.

To the 9th: I have heard that all the property taken was carried to Alexandria.

To the 10th: I have heard and believe that the property taken was used by the army which was encamped in and around Alexandria.

To the 11th and 12th: No complaint was made, nor was any receipt or voucher asked for.

To the 13th: None of the property was taken secretly. I was told that it was all taken about midday.

To the 14th: General Banks's entire army was encamped in and around Alexandria, the nearest camp being about two miles and a half from the plantation from which the property was taken. It had been encamped there about five or eight days, and remained until about the 1st of April, 1864. There had been no battle nor skirmish near there before the property was taken. I did not know any of the officers of the army.

To the 15th: There was corn in good condition, well ripened, dry, and unhusked, but stored in a crib. It could not have been purchased at the time when taken for less than two dollars and a half per barrel. The sheep and hogs were all in good condition, and worth at least—hogs $5, sheep two and a half dollars per head. Indeed, none of the articles specified could have been purchased anywhere in the neighborhood for the price I have charged in my petition.

To the 16th: I judge of quantity taken from what my wife and daughter told me, and from the fact that I knew what I had left on the place just before I started up Red River with Porter's fleet.

To the 19th: I do believe that the property specified was taken for the actual use of the army, and not for the mere gratification of individual officers or soldiers.

To the 20th: I believe the army at that time required fresh food.

To the 21st: I believe the want for the articles taken was so urgent as to justify the soldiers in such taking.

To the 22d: I think so.

To the 23d: I do believe that the property specified was taken by order of some officer who was properly empowered to issue such order.

I hereunto annex as proof of my loyalty document marked B.

JOHN M. MARTIN.

Sworn to before me, December 30, 1871.

WM. GRANT,
Special Commissioner.

I hereby certify that the foregoing fifteen pages of depositions were taken in my presence and reduced to writing by my clerk, and carefully read over to the claimant and witness and by them signed at the time, place, and in the manner stated in the caption sheet hereof.

Given under my hand and official seal, at New Orleans, La., this 30th day of December, 1871.

WILLIAM GRANT,
United States Commissioner and Special Commissioner.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, December 3, 1891.

Pursuant to section 882 of the Revised Statutes, I hereby certify that the annexed is a true copy of an original paper on file in this Department.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the Treasury Department to be affixed, on the day and year first above written.

CHAS. J. FOLGER,
Secretary of the Treasury.

Extracts from the reports of Offr. Azariah F. Wild, New Orleans, La., in matter of Benjamin Weil.

SEPTEMBER 17, 1877.

Being detained here waiting the return of the United States attorney, I improved the opportunity to commence writing my report in the case of Benjamin Weil vs. Mexico for 500 bales of cotton which Weil claims was taken from him by the Mexican authorities in the year 1864, while en route to Matamoras, Mexico, and for which an award has been allowed of about $500,000, and as I am informed not yet paid, but has been brought to the notice of Congress, and is now pending before a committee of the Senate.

My connections with this case were those of a clerk, and commenced about the month of May, 1876, and so continued until about the time Judge M. A. Dooley left Louisiana to reside, and I became employed by the United States Treasury Department, when I refused to have anything further to do with the case, although have been pressed to do so by both sides, on one side to continue in the case and take it up where Judge Dooley left it, and by the other side to give my affidavit of what I knew about the case, to be used before a Congressional committee, both of which I refused.

First. I could not work in any case except for the Government.

Second. I did not feel at liberty to make an affidavit of what information I gained by being a confidential clerk of Judge Dooley's, a sworn attorney.

My reasons thus expressed to Gen. Slaughter caused him to say that, unless he could have my affidavit, he would have me brought to Washington to testify.

I now will state the case, and the way in which I became engaged in it, and will forward copies of some twenty letters now under my control at an early day.

John M. Martin, an old steamboat captain, residing in New Orleans, met me at the corner of Canal and St. Charles streets in the month of May, 1876, and asked me to introduce him to Col. Brooks (now chief of secret service division); I replied I could not unless he had business. He (Martin) said he had business; that he had the cotton rolls of ex-Confederate Agent McKee, of the transmississippi department, which would be of value to the Government, and that he (Martin) wanted to see Col. Brooks and try and sell them to the Government through him (Brooks), and if agreeable to him would have a time set when we could meet and examine the rolls, etc.

I saw Col. Brooks: an appointment was made to be held at his (Brooks') room, No. 146 Carondelet street. I notified Capt. Martin, and we met at place designated, and the rolls were examined by Col. Brooks. Soon after Col. Brooks left for Washington, and Martin says left him to understand he would submit the matter to the Treasury Department and let him (Martin) know if the Department wanted them. Col. Brooks had been gone but a few days when Capt. Martin made daily calls at the office of Judge Dooley, in whose office I occupied a desk, and asked if anything had been heard from Col. Brooks.

After waiting several weeks he persuaded Judge Dooley to dictate a letter to the Attorney-General, and I wrote it, to which Mr. Taft replied that the Government had the rolls of which his letter spoke, etc. Capt. Martin, after hearing his rolls were not wanted, said:

"I have a big case, in which there is some money in. Will you take it judge?"

Judge Dooley replied that he would not take a case until he knew what it was. Capt. Martin then replied that he would tell some time, but would tell Wild first, and Wild might explain the case to him (Dooley). When Capt. Martin started out he called me and asked me to put on my hat. We went to Hugo Ralwitz's saloon, on Common street, when he made me pledge myself to keep the matter private, and he would show me the whole case, and that he would give Judge Dooley and myself a chance to make "a file," as he called it. He commenced by asking if I had ever heard of the Benjamin Weil cotton claim for a large lot of cotton captured by the Mexicans in the year 1864, and that the claim was brought before the Mixed Commission, and that they had made an award amounting to over $500,000. I said no, I had never heard a word of it.

Martin said: "I tell you the truth; the claim is all a fraud, and Weil never lost a single pound of cotton, and I can furnish the evidence to defeat the claim, and this is what I want you and Judge Dooley to do; that is, I want you to talk to the judge and see if he will take hold of the case, and if he will, I will bring in some letters that have been written by John T. Michel, of this city, when I come, and the answers to them written by the Mexican minister, Ignacio Mariscal."

I consulted with Judge Dooley, and he said, "If the case is as he (Martin) has represented it to you, to be a fraud, and it can be shown as such, and the Mexican Government will pay, I will take hold of it." I told Martin what Judge Dooley said, and in one or two days Martin came in and brought along two letters written, or purporting to have been written, by John T. Michel, of New Orleans, to the Mexican minister (Ignacio Mariscal) at Washington, with two letters from the Mexican minister to John T. Michel, of New Orleans, La., in answer to those written by him (Michel).

The judge then took from Capt. Martin the four letters, and called upon Mr. Avendano, the Mexican consul at New Orleans, and showed them to him, who, after reading them, said he knew the claim to be a fraud, and had so reported it to his Government, which was all that he could do in the case; but would give Judge Dooley a letter recommending him to his minister, Mr. Mariscal, if he desired, to which Judge Dooley consented, and left. One or two days after, Mr. Avendano sent a note to Judge Dooley that he had written and mailed a letter recommending him, and that he could then correspond direct with his minister at Washington.

On this information Judge Dooley commenced his correspondence in this case by first writing to the minister, who, in response, among other things, said a confidential agent would soon call on him, in New Orleans, who would show him (Dooley) copies of his (Dooley's) letters, which would be evidence that he was in good standing with his Goverernment, and was to be trusted, etc.

In a few days, Gen. Slaughter, of Mobile, Ala., called and presented not only Judge Dooley's letters, but copies of the evidence in the case. It seems that Gen. Slaughter had made an agreement for a large percentage of the claim to get such evidence as would reverse the decision already made by Sir Edward Thornton, and that said Slaughter wanted Judge Dooley to give up all the information he had, or might obtain, to him (Slaughter) without consideration, to which Judge Dooley would not consent after consultation with Capt. Martin.

It now became clear that Capt. John M. Martin and George D. Hite, of New Orleans, were the principal witnesses in the case on which the award is based, and when I came down on Martin with the direct question, "Did you not testify in the Weil case in support of the claim?" he replied, "I did." I then said: "You have placed yourself in a very bad light in the case;" that Judge Dooley had got mad; that he did not fully explain the case at the start. He then said he would give me the whole case, just as it was, from the beginning to the end, and started out by saying that he knew Benjamin Weil; that Weil wanted him to testify in the case, and also get one or two other witnesses, if he could; that he also knew George D. Hite well, and that he and Hite made a verbal agreement with Benjamin Weil to testify in the case and what to swear to, and that if the claim went through, as it must, they were each to have the sum of $10,000 out of the award; that they all trusted to each other's word in the matter and never had a written agreement; that about the time the claim was allowed Benjamin Weil was taken crazy and sent to an insane asylum in France. This frightened Martin and Hite, and they turned tail to the claimant and commenced to feel of the other side by writing the letters heretofore spoken of as those of John T. Michel.

George D. Hite has not been to see me, and I have refused to call on him since the case has turned out as it has, but Martin tells me that he and Hite are one in the transaction, and neither he or Hite could move without the consent of the other. Since I have refused to act in the case for Martin and Hite, I am reliably informed that Martin has got up or caused to be written two letters and their answers, purporting to be from him to the Mexican minister at Washington, and his reply to them, offering a large percentage of the claim in case of defeat for such evidence as will bring it about. These letters are gotten up in New Orleans, sent to a friend of Martin's at Washington, and then remailed at New Orleans with the Mexican minister's name forged to those which purport to be in answer to Martin, and he (Martin) is to take these to one Kain (a Jew), who is now the principal owner in the claim, and say to him, "Come down, or I will expose the claim."

I asked Martin which story the Commission were to believe, the one he had already sworn to, or the one which he wanted to swear to for a consideration. He replied: "Neither George D. Hite nor myself were anywhere near the place we swore to in that testimony at the time we swore we were, and in case the parties will come down handsomely will produce documents to show it."

SEPTEMBER 26, 1877.

Please find inclosed herewith copies of correspondence in the case of Benjamin Weil vs. Mexico, which I mentioned in my report of September 17, 1877.

1. Letter from John T. Michel to Ignacius Mariscal, Mexican minister, dated New Orleans, January 26, 1876.
2. Letter from Mexican minister to John T. Michel, dated at Washington, February 3, 1876.
3. Letter from John T. Michel to Mexican minister, dated New Orleans, February 9, 1876.
4. Letter from Mexican minister to John T. Michel, dated Washington, February 21, 1876.
5. Letter from L. W. Avonduno, Mexican consul at New Orleans, dated June 3, 1876, to M. A. Dooley.
6. Letter from M. A. Dooley to Sgn. Mariscal, dated New Orleans, June 4, 1876.
7. Letter from Sgn. Mariscal to M. A. Dooley, dated New York, June 8, 1876.
8. Letter from M. A. Dooley to Sgn. Mariscal, dated New Orleans, June 13, 1876.
9. Letter from M. A. Dooley to Sgn. Mariscal, dated New Orleans, June 19, 1876.
10. Letter from Sgn. Mariscal to M. A. Dooley, dated New York, June 22, 1876.
11. Letter from M. A. Dooley to Sgn. Mariscal, dated New Orleans, June 26, 1876.
12. Letter from M. A. Dooley to Sgn. Mariscal, dated New Orleans, June 28, 1876.
13. Letter from M. A. Dooley to Zamacona, dated New Orleans, August 5, 1876.
14. Letter from M. A. Dooley to E. Aveta, dated New Orleans, August 24, 1876.
15. Letter from M. A. Dooley to E. Aveta, dated New Orleans, September 4, 1876.
16. Letter from James E. Slaughter to M. A. Dooley, dated Mobile, August 11, 1877.
17. Copy of affidavit made by John M. Martin, alias Michel, in support of Benjamin Weil's claim against Mexico, dated New Orleans, July 25, 1870.

I would respectfully state that these copies are all in my handwriting and were prepared under the direction of Judge M. A. Dooley, late of New Orleans (now San Saba County, Tex.), to forward to the President of Mexico, but owing to the disturbed condition of the Mexican Government they were not sent, and when Judge Dooley left Louisiana he left them here. Those written by Judge Dooley, or purporting to have come from him, to the Mexican officials are in their possession, but those received here by Judge Dooley from them are still here in Louisiana, and can be got, if they are wanted, by little trouble.

OCTOBER 19, 1877.

I met Capt. John M. Martin to-day. and learn from him he is quite uneasy in the matter of the claim of Benjamin Weil vs. Mexico. He has written more letters and having them copied by some party here in New Orleans, and then sends them to the third party in Washington, where they are mailed back here to Martin. These letters purport to come from the Mexican minister at Washington, D. C. Ernest F. Herwig, ex-senator, then takes these letters to Kain, a rich Jew, who owns most of the claim, and who is president of the Germania Bank of New Orleans, and, to the best of my belief, receives money for Martin, as they pretend, to keep Martin and George D. Hite from exposing the fraud and perjury which they have committed. There is no point in the case but what I can make here. I know not just what more is wanted, but would respectfully request that should anything more be wanted to complete evidence to show the case a complete fraud, that I be instructed on what points, and it will be forwarded at once.

Martin has offered to make an affidavit setting forth that he and George D. Hite committed perjury, and were not in Texas at the time they alleged in their testimony in the case, for a consideration contingent on defeating the claim. I would respectfully state that Lambert B. Cain (or sometimes spelled Kain) and Decrastro, the attorney, are now away from New Orleans, and are said to be in Washington City.

I would state that since returning to headquarters from Arkansas I have found the original letter written by Judge Dooley to the Mexican minister, Mariscal, in pencil, and from which I wrote the first original letter, which I will forward should it be wanted.

FEBRUARY 23, 1878.

I will respectfully state that Capt. John M. Martin, whom I reported as being connected with the claim of Benjamin Weil vs. Mexico, met me to-day and expressed a wish to see Gen. Slaughter and see if he could not make some money by going before the proper officer and swear to the contrary to what he swore to in support of the claim. He states whatever he does George D. Hite will also do in the matter.

APRIL 25, 1878.

I met Capt. John M. Martin, whom I have mentioned in a previous report as being one of the parties who gave evidence in the claim of Benjamin Weil vs. Mexico, and helped to pass the claim through. He (Martin) states that Weil issued to parties who assisted him in the claim certificates of indebtedness on condition that if the claim was allowed that he would pay them. He (Martin) further stated to me that at the time of giving said deposition or soon after, Weil gave him $50 and promised him five thousand more in case he was successful in the prosecution of said claim.

He further states that one L. B. Cain, of New Orleans, La., has bought up all, or nearly all, the certificates of indebtedness issued by Weil, and now is the monied man who is working the claim and who owns nearly all of it.

From 8 o'clock a. m. to 10 a. m. I was engaged at Levy's stable, on Baronne street, making some inquiries into the case of Benjamin Weil vs. Mexico. Mr. Levy was a partner for twenty years with Benjamin Weil, and says he (Weil) had no money or cotton at the time for which he is claiming from the Mexican Government. He further states that the claim is a fraud got up by Weil and a few others to swindle the Government of Mexico. He informs me also while the claim is brought in the name of Weil he believes there are a large number whose names do not appear that would receive a pro rata had the claim been allowed. Mr. Levy gave me a copy of writing, which I inclose herein; the original is now in the hands of Jules Aroni, attorney at law, who has an office at 140 Gravier street, New Orleans. I am informed by Mr. Levy that this is a sample of a large amount now out and issued by Benjamin Weil to those who assisted him in getting up the claim and those who are partners to the transaction.

I am informed that a man named E. Lardner had in his possession $15,000 of this paper, but as Mr. Lardner resides in Mississippi, and is engaged in running a schooner, it is quite inconvenient for me to see him.

JUNE 22, 1878.

Capt. John M. Martin met me on the street to-day and opened conversation about the claim of Benjamin Weil vs. Mexico. While I know Capt. Martin to be a perjured scoundrel, and a very dangerous man, I will give for what it is worth what he said to me in this conversation. He (Martin) said, "I have been to see Geo. D. Hite about this Weil claim, and we have made up our minds to come out and show up the whole claim to be a fraud and put-up job and the testimony given by each of us to have been false (in support of the claim), on the condition that you will negotiate with the Mexican Government or agent on the following terms: For Geo. D. Hite, $15,000; for John M. Martin, $5,000.

Martin said it was proposed to pay me for my trouble as follows:

Hite to pay me	$3,000
Martin to pay me	1,000
Total	4,000

They are very anxious I should make the negotiations, and I have put them off, saying I would see what can be done.

SEPTEMBER 4, 1878.

Capt. John M. Martin, who swore in the cotton case of Benjamin Weil vs. Mexico, again approached me and offered to place his deposition in my possession. Also that he would procure a similar one from George D. Hite, another witness in the case, setting forth that the testimony given by them was false, provided I would take the matter in hand and get a certain sum of money from the Mexican Government, and would pay me one-third of the amount so received. I left Capt. Martin with the impression that I would consider the matter and give him an early answer. The Mexican Government can get the evidence in this city to show this case up provided they exert themselves. I do not understand it to be my duty to specially work on this case further than to report what comes under my notice while working other cases in which the United States Government is interested. Capt. Martin is now so poor and destitute that now is a good time to work him.

Mr. MORGAN. The secret agent of the Government, as I say, got trail of this matter and found this man Martin, besides others, and Martin, not knowing of his agency for the Government, failing to get out of Weil and Mrs. Weil's assignee, Cain, all that he had expected to get, concluded he would turn around and turn State's evidence through this detective and see what the Mexican minister would pay him for his information. He then went on to detail what a lot of lies he had sworn to himself and what others had done in getting up this claim of Mr. Weil. I have not time to read that testimony. I am merely reading a record so that the world will see that the committee have not gone through this matter without the strictest and severest attention to all the facts in this cause.

A Mexican minister, I think it was Mr. Marescal while he was here, happened to be acquainted with Gen. Slaughter, who was a Confederate officer down on the Mexican border during the war, and was there at the time of the surrender. Slaughter was a gallant man and had a very important command on the Rio Grande River under Gen. Kirby Smith, and was there at the close of the operations of the war. He had a good deal to do, I think, with assisting the Mexicans in their difficulties with Maximilian. He spoke Spanish very well, had been in the Mexican country a great deal, and immediately after the surrender he went to Mexico and remained there for two or three years. He wanted to go there and make it his home.

Finally he returned to the United States and became employed as an engineer—he was a civil engineer and graduated at West Point—on the public works down in the Gulf of Mexico. Being acquainted with the Spanish language and, of course, with Mexicans and Spaniards, when he would find them they would naturally have a conversation. Mr. Marescal, or else the consul at New Orlerns, came in contact with Gen. Slaughter. The fact that this enormous amount of money had been awarded to this little man Weil by Sir Edward Thornton had gone out to the world. It aroused the immediate attention of every Jew in all the Southern States. It turned out that Weil, according to the articles of agreement which are here, was a member during the Confederate war of five or six firms of Jews who lived in Louisiana and Texas, and who were engaged in shipping cotton out of the country and in bringing in supplies. Some went through Mexico and some through Texas ports, and supplies were brought in. He was in the employment of the governor of Louisiana.

In order to conduct the business satisfactorily all around these different firms formed a united arrangement amongst themselves that they would share in all the gains and all the losses of their business, that they would pool everthing they had. They were all engaged in this kind of operation. So they kept up with each other and each of these four or five firms was entitled to a part of all that was earned. Weil was a member of the firm, one of the active agents going about buying up cotton and shipping it out of the country, getting up wool and everything of that kind. So when this enormous award was published through the newspapers in favor of Weil all of these parties wanted to know how he got so much money out of this transacsion and they were not included. He takes particular pains in his affidavit and so does Mr. Cain, who swore that Weil was alone interested in this matter, that nobody was concerned with him at all, so as to shut everybody else off.

Of course these men resented that, and began at once to talk about it and to go back and look up Weil's correspondence and compare his whereabouts and other things with his allegations in his affidavit, and they unhesitatingly come out and state, and here are the affidavits, and swear that there is not a particle of justice in his claim, that he never had a pound of cotton; that he had no caravan; that he had nothing, and they exposed him.

Slaughter being there, of course heard of it, as everybody else did, and in conversation with Spaniards and Mexicans about the city of New Orleans naturally he talked about it and said, "I was down on that frontier all during the war, remained there afterwards, and went over to Mexico, and am perfectly familiar with the Mexican officers of any rank, and I know this thing can not be so. I know that this man could not have carried that caravan of 1,900 bales of cotton on his wagons through that part of the country without my knowing it; he could not have assembled the cotton; it would have been a matter of impossibility, and I know it is not so."

Gen. Slaughter's statements were sent to Washington to the Mexican minister, and he at once authorized an engagement to be made for Gen. Slaughter's services to look this matter up. He went around and he looked it up, and here is what he got: He got 234 letters of Weil and other original papers, every one bearing upon the point and every one contradicting Weil. He got hold of the original papers and correspondence of Weil with his different firms, which utterly disproved the whole business, and those original letters are here now in the custody of our State Department. Here are copies of each one of them, and here is a list of these 234 letters which I will incorporate in my remarks, from page 124 to page 127, inclusive.

The list referred to is as follows:

WASHINGTON, February 29, 1884.

There is in another part of the report a summarized statement of what is proven by each of these letters, but I think it would only swell the RECORD, perhaps without its ever being examined or read, if I should put that in. The reports which are on file here, however, show a copy of each one of these letters, and they are all proven, all authenticated.

Then there is a number of affidavits of different people utterly overturning and controverting in every possible way the statements of those four or five fellows who put in affidavits to prove this claim.

Now the Senate will see that this claim was retarded, it was kept back, it was not presented through any government, but it was run in here after Mr. Weil had gone around and got his pockets stuffed with four or five affidavits. The claim was run in to that commission with the affidavit of his attorney, Judge Key, who perhaps had never seen one of these papers, and then afterwards these papers were brought in for the purpose of acting as depositions, ex parte statements, without any opportunity of cross examination, and some of them made apparently by men whom nobody has ever been able to hear of.

Mr. GEORGE. Made by what?

Mr. MORGAN. Made by men whom nobody has ever been able to trace or hear of.

Mr. GEORGE. Sham men.

Mr. MORGAN. Certainly, Sampeyreac and such men, whose existence was assumed when there was nothing of it.

Now, I will turn to the La Abra case. After having put this very brief and unsatisfactory summary of the evidence before the Senate on the subject of the Weil claim, let us see who got the money for this.

Sumner Stow Ely, out of the first and second installments, got $94,106.75, that he distributed according to his own judgment of what was the right disposition to make of it. Then comes the third installment. That was paid to Sumner Stow Ely.

Installments.	How distributed.	Amount.	Total.
Third	.....	.....	$48,858.77
	Check 263, September 17, 1879, Sumner Stow Ely, attorney for La Abra Silver Mining Company (delivered to George H. Williams, attorney, in person)	$38,858.77
	Agreement between Sumner Stow Ely, A. W. Adams, and George H. Williams (dated October 9, 1879), whereby Mr. Williams is to receive $16,000; $3,326.50 out of first and second installments and balance pro rata. (See letter from George H. Williams, October 18, 1879.)
	Power of attorney from Henry C. Hepburn (dated November 29, 1879) to Sumner Stow Ely, to collect his entire interest in this award. (See letter from Sumner Stow Ely, December 2, 1879.)
	Check 267, December 6, 1879, Henry C. Hepburn, assignee (delivered to Sumner Stow Ely, attorney, in person)	2,909.94
	No further payment to be made to Mr. Hepburn, he having been settled with in full. (See letter from Sumner Stow Ely, December 2, 1879.)
	Check 268, January 20, 1880, Sumner Stow Ely, attorney for La Abra Silver Mining Company (sent to Mr. Ely, 39 West Tenth street, New York, January 22, 1880)	2,690.06
	Assignment by La Abra Silver Mining Company (dated February 4, 1881) to Charles T. Parry and Joseph Hopkinson of $4,400; $1,257.20 to be paid out of the third installment, and $314.28 out of each of the succeeding ten installments, commencing with the fifth. (Filed by James Baird, February 5, 1881.)
	Check 286, February 14, 1881, Charles T. Parry and Joseph Hopkinson, assignees (sent to them, 727 Walnut street, Philadelphia, February 17, 1881)	$1,257.30
	Check 285, February 14, 1881, Sumner Stow Ely, attorney for La Abra Silver Mining Company (delivered to Mr. Ely in person)	3,142.80
	Power of attorney from La Abra Silver Mining Company (dated March 25, 1880) to Sumner Stow Ely to collect fourth installment, with full power of substitution. (Filed by Sumner Stow Ely, April 3, 1890.		$48,858.77
	George H. Williams admits having received $3,326.50 from Sumner Stow Ely, the amount due him out of the first and second installments. (See his letter of August 4, 1880.)
	Power of attorney from Sumner Stow Ely (dated August 17, 1879), to Samuel Shellabarger, to collect fourth installment. (Filed by Samuel Shellabarger, August 18, 1880.)

The fourth installment commences to be divided out on a broader basis.

Fourth	.....	.....	48,858.77
	Check 559, August 16, 1880, Sumner Stow Ely, attorney for La Abra Silver Mine Company (delivered to Samuel Shellabarger, attorney, in person)	32,706.64
	Check 560, August 16, 1880, George H. Williams (delivered to him in person)	1,152.13
	Decree of supreme court of the District of Columbia (dated January 21, 1881) that there shall be paid out of this installment the sum of $15,000, as follows:
	To Frederick P. Stanton $3,333.33
	To Miller & Lewis for Thomas W. Bartley 3,333.33
	To W. W. Boyce 3,333.33
	To Shellabarger & Wilson, for Alonzo W. Adams 5,000.00
	(Filed by Shellabarger & Wilson, January 25, 1881.)
	Check 569, January 26, 1881, Frederick P. Stanton (delivered to him in person)	3,333.34
	Check 570, January 26, 1881, Miller & Lewis, for Thomas W. Bartley (delivered to them in person)	3,333.33

Mr. DOLPH. Will the Senator from Alabama yield to me a moment?

Mr. MORGAN. Certainly.

Mr. DOLPH. Can he tell me who George H. Williams is?

Mr. MORGAN. No, I can not inform the Senator. I do not remember whether he was one of the attorneys or not. I think he was, though I am not sure of that.

	Check 571, January 26, 1881, W. W. Boyce (delivered to him in person)	3,333.33
	Check 572, January 26, 1881, Shellabarger & Wilson, for Alonzo W. Adams (delivered to Mr. Shellabarger in person)	5,000.00	48,858.77

Alonzo W. Adams was the man employed to get the La Abra case up before it went before the Commission, and he has been paid very large sums of money.

	Shellabarger & Wilson, for Alonzo W. Adams, etc	5,000.00
	Assignment by La Abra Silver Mining Company (dated May 6, 1880) to Cyrus C. Camp, as executor of estate of Herman Camp, deceased, the sum of $10,000, to be taken in eleven payments of $909.10 each. (See letter from Sumner Stow Ely, September 14, 1880.)
	Receipt of Cyrus C. Camp to the company for the sum due on the fourth installment. (See letter from Sumner Stow Ely, October 30, 1880.)
	Assignment by La Abra Silver Mining Company (dated February 4, 1881) to Shellabarger & Wilson of $5,266 of this award, $2,633 to be paid out of the fifth and $2,633 to be paid out of the sixth installments.
	Agreement between A. W. Adams and Sumner Stow Ely on the one part, and Shellabarger & Wilson on the other (dated October 4, 1879) in regard to the fees of the latter. (Filed by Shellabarger & Wilson, February 8, 1881.)
	Assignment by La Abra Silver Mining Company (dated February 5, 1881) to William W. Boyce of $8,666.66 to be paid pro rata. (See letter from Thomas W. Bartley, February 8, 1881.)
	Assignment by La Abra Silver Mining Company (dated February 8, 1881) to Thomas W. Bartley of $6,166.66 to be paid pro rata. (See letter from Thomas W. Bartley, February 8, 1881.)
	Assignment by La Abra Silver Mining Company (dated February 8, 1881) to Frederick P. Stanton of $6,166.66 to be paid pro rata. (Filed by Frederick P. Stanton, February 8, 1881.)

Installments.	How distributed.	Amount.	Total.
	Power of attorney from La Abra Silver Mining Company (dated February 4, 1881) to Sumner Stow Ely to collect fifth installment, with full power of substitution. Power of substitution from Sumner Stow Ely (dated February 4, 1881) to Samuel Shellabarger to collect fifth installment. (Filed by Samuel Shellabarger, February 8, 1881.)

That was the fourth installment. The fifth installment was divided as follows:

Fifth			$48,858.77
	Check 836, March 5, 1881, Sumner Stow Ely, attorney for La Abra Silver Mining Company	$34,545.85

	Assignment by La Abra Silver Mining Company (dated November 23, 1881) to Thomas W. Bartley of $2,500 out of the fifth installment, and $833.33 out of each of the succeeding eight installments, that is to say the sixth, seventh, eighth, ninth, tenth, eleventh, twelfth, and thirteenth, and $208.33 out of the fourteenth. (Filed by Thomas W. Bartley, November 25, 1881.)
	Assignment by La Abra Silver Mining Company to Frederick P. Stanton, of the same date as above, for like amount and payment to be made in like manner. (Filed by Frederick P. Stanton, November 25, 1881.)
	Memorandum of settlement by Bartley & Stanton (dated November 25, 1881) of all outstanding questions as regards their fees in this case. The above assignments are in full satisfaction of their claim. (Filed by Bartley & Stanton, November 25, 1881.)
	Check 897, November 25, 1881, Sumner Stow Ely, attorney for La Abra Silver Mining Company (delivered to Samuel Shellabarger, attorney, in person)	2,034.15
	Check 898, November 25, 1881, Thomas W. Bartley, assignee (delivered to him in person)	2,500.00
	Check 899, November 25, 1881, Frederick P. Stanton, assignee (delivered to him in person)	2,500.00	48,858.77

The assignments that are made as set forth here in brief show the different installments of this fund running down to the very last one, out of which the various agents and attorneys are to receive the money as it is realized, so that their claim in respect of this fund now in the hands of the Secretary of State of the United States is a continuing demand and includes every installment to be hereafter made.

Mr. President, I will now close my remarks upon both cases, feeling that I have done very inadequate justice to myself in my attempt to lay before the Senate in a succinct form, and in an intelligible narrative form, the pith and kernel of the great mass of matter included in the reports upon both the cases.

I have merely to address this consideration to the attention of the Senate. The Committee on Foreign Relations have sought diligently, earnestly, sincerely to get at every fact in this case and every principle of law which could affect it, because it is a case that not merely involves the rights of private citizens, but, according to all accounts and according to all admissions of four Presidents and four Secretaries of State and various committees of Congress, this matter involves the honor of our country.

We can not afford to be inattentive to considerations of this kind, and the committee have not been inattentive to them. They have labored—I have and other gentlemen of the committee who have passed out of the Senate, many of them heretofore, have labored with me—until I happen to have the good fortune of having my friend from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH] associated with me in these hard labors For years and years and years we have been at it and resorted to every possible agency that could be obtained to get at the truth, heard arguments freely on all sides and on all occasions, and have permitted a great many things to be said and to be done and to be proven that did not appear to be relative in the technical legal sense of the word, and we have presented this report.

I am very grateful, Mr. President, that I am about to be relieved from a labor which has caused me so much anxiety and so much distress, for a large number of persons, as we see here, are directly interested in this fund. The old La Abra Company is broken all into shreds and nobody will get anything out of it. Although there are judgment creditors standing there to the amount of thousands of dollars in New York, they will never get a cent. Everything has passed out of its reach by assignment of these decrees. Weil, the poor, wicked man became insane, I suppose through the burdens of his own wickedness, and left his widow, and she got not over four or five hundred dollars, while over $100,000 have been paid into the hands of these thieves and marauders, and she will never get another cent. She is not entitled to it of course, but she would never get it if she were.

This fund has all been planted in the hands of men who have earned it, if men can so earn money simply by violating an oath to Almighty God in respect to the truth they profess to tell in the creation of this fund. I regret, Mr. President, that I have had to say so much about it, that I have been thrown in contact so intimately with a subject that is in itself unpleasant. I leave this subject now in the hope that I shall never again have to recur to it.

Mr. HAWLEY. Is a vote desired this afternoon on this question?

Mr. DOLPH. If a vote can be had without a call of the yeas and nays I should not object, but I desire to suggest to the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], who has just concluded his remarks, whether, if everybody has spoken now who desires to do so, it would not be practicable to have an agreement to take up and vote on the bill under consideration and the one in regard to the Weil claim immediately after the morning business is concluded on Monday next, when the Senate again convenes.

I should like, if possible, to arrive at an agreement by which we can get to the end of the discussion and come to a vote, and I should like to have it in a full Senate. I therefore ask unanimous consent that that course be pursued on the bill under consideration and the other bill before the Senate, as the legal questions are the same in both cases, and as I think nobody in the Senate will have the temerity to dispute the facts in the case, it seems to me the Senate ought to be able to dispose of them by voting.

Mr. MORGAN. I will ask unanimous consent of the Senate that the Weil case shall be taken up and voted on without further discussion, unless some Senator desires to discuss it, in which event I shall be perfectly willing to yield, immediately succeeding the vote on the present bill, so that we can get rid of this whole question. Then I am willing to say that we shall take a vote on this at 3 o'clock on Monday by unanimous consent.

Mr. DOLPH. Or earlier, if no one wishes to discuss it.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. DOLPH. It will come up at 2 o'clock on Monday as the unfinished business.

Mr. MORGAN. It would come up then, but Senators generally have some demands on them about 2 o'clock that would not make it very convenient for all to be then present.

Mr. DOLPH. I will submit to the suggestion of the Senator.

Mr. MORGAN. I will say 3 o'clock.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request made by the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. VILAS. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that I shall offer some amendments to the bill when the proper time arrives for the introduction of amendments.

I have no purpose to make any discussion upon the bill in addition to that which has been presented, but from having had occasion some time since in another place to become acquainted in a general way with the circumstances which have been so abundantly exhibited to the Senate, I have felt reawakened to a very earnest desire to see this bill passed, and in such a form as to avoid every objection which might reasonably be urged to it, technically or otherwise.

Indeed, I think no Senator who has listened to the account given by the distinguished Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] of the struggles which the public conscience has undergone during sixteen years but must sympathize with the effort for its relief; somewhat like the famous pilgrim up in Mr. Bunyan's veritable history, heavy laden with the burdens upon him, the moral sense of the country, the public conscience, has been seeking some avenue for relief, and we have heard an interesting account of how, groping, as it were, to climb over a mountain range of objection and difficulty and opposition, here it has been met by one insurmountable obstacle and there by another, until at last it would seem that a defile has been discovered through which this remorse-struck conscience can at last penetrate the light and cast off the burden which has oppressed it.

Objection is made now—and it is to that to which I wish to address a mere observation with reference to these amendments—that this submission of the question for determination is not judicial or is not the proper invocation of the judicial power of the United States. That the question which this bill proposes to submit to the courts of the United States is in its nature judicial seems to find no objection, but it is said that this question is not judicial or does not invoke judicial power because it does not leave it to the courts to pronounce a final judgment which will be binding by virtue of the decree of the court upon the parties to the suit to be instituted.

I conceive that that objection has considerable weight as the bill stands, but it seems to me that it is easy to remove it, and that it is desirable to remove it, because it can not but be thought desirable to invoke the superintending judgment of the Supreme Court upon such a question as this by the appeal provided for in this bill. In the case to which reference has been made we have an easy example and illustration of what is necessary to complete, as it seems to me, the bill which has been prepared. It lies merely in this, that the submission to the Court of Claims with the right of appeal to the Supreme Court shall be a submission to result in a final judgment, which shall be obligatory upon the parties.

That judgment will spring or follow naturally, as it seems to me, from the consideration to be given by the court under this bill to the case to be submitted. It is a simple case in equity. An officer of the United States holds in his hands a fund. The United States has the custody and care of that fund. Mexico has no claim to it. The treaty made its payment a finality, but by virtue of the statute of the United States previously enacted and by virtue of the nature of the award itself and the fact that certain claimants invoked the judgment of the Mixed Commission for the United States there is an equity of claim in Weil and his representatives or assigns in the one case and in the La Abra Mining Company, its legal representatives and assigns, in the other. The Attorney-General is therefore directed to bring a suit in the name of the United States for what? Practically to bar and foreclose as by a strict foreclosure the rights, whether legal or equitable, of these claimants to that fund.

Now, that is a perfectly recognizable subject of equitable jurisdiction, entirely competent for the court to proceed with, and it remains only, as it would seem to me, to add to this bill that the suit which shall be so instituted in the Court of Claims, and subject to appeal, shall result in a final and conclusive judgment. If so, we are then within the exact precedents which the Supreme Court of the United States has established with reference to the Court of Claims.

All there was which caused the decision in the case of Gordon vs. The United States was simply that the fourteenth section of the act of 1863 provided that after the judgment of the Court of Claims should be rendered, the money should not be paid until the Secretary of the Treasury submitted an estimate to Congress and that estimate was approved.

That was held by the late Chief Justice Taney, with the assent of his associates upon the bench, to be such an interference with the finality of the decision of the court as to shear the court of its judicial power. That difficulty in the case of the Court of Claims was removed simply by an act which repealed the fourteenth section of the act of 1863, and thus left no right in the Secretary of the Treasury to pass any further judgment on the question. Does not that point the way to amend this bill so as to bring it unquestionably within that decision?

I purpose, therefore, to submit to the consideration of the Senate an amendment which shall alter the first section of the bill, so that it shall read: That the case shall be brought—

To determine whether the award made by the United States and Mexican Mixed Commission in respect to the claim of the said La Abra Silver Mining Company was obtained, as to the whole sum included therein or as to any part thereof, by fraud, effectuated by means of false swearing or other false and fraudulent practices on the part of the said La Abra Silver Mining Company, or its agents, attorneys, or assigns, and, in case it be so determined, to bar and foreclose all claim in law or equity on the part of said La Abra Silver Mining Company, its legal representatives or assigns, to the money, or any such part thereof, received from the Republic of Mexico for or on account of such award as was made by said Mexican Mixed Commission upon the said claim.

In case the United States prevails in that suit that will then be a final judgment against the claimants. On the other hand, I suggest to amend section 4 of the bill so as to provide:

That in case it shall be finally adjudged in said cause that the award made by said Mixed Commission, so far as it relates to the claim of the La Abra Silver Mining Company, was obtained through fraud effectuated by means of false swearing or other false and fraudulent practices of said company or its assigns, or by their procurement, the said La Abra Silver Mining Company, its legal representatives or assigns, be barred and foreclosed of all claim to the money or any part thereof so paid by the Republic of Mexico for or on account of such award as was made upon the claim of said company.

Then the President of the United States is authorized to release the Government of Mexico from the further payment thereof, etc.

Correspondingly with that theory of the suit I suggest also to amend section 5 of the bill by striking out the last words:

And in case said court shall decide in said suit that said La Abra Silver Mining Company, or its successors and assigns, are, in justice and equity entitled to any part of said award that shall remain to be paid or distributed, the Secretary of State shall proceed to distribute the same to the persons entitled thereto.

And make the language conform there to the language in the first section of the bill that in case it shall be determined that the award was not obtained by fraud as aforesaid, then that the money shall be paid to the parties entitled thereto under the order of distribution.

That makes the judgment of the court a final and conclusive judgment upon the two parties to the suit, the United States on the one hand, and the claimants on the other.

Let me observe also that that removes from the bill the objection which was suggested by the learned Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] that another than a legal rule of disposition was provided for; that the court was asked to consider moral considerations, obviously an objection if we leave it simply that the court is invested with full jurisdiction to consider a simple action or suit in equity, based upon a familiar ground of equitable jurisdiction, to foreclose and cut off all the rights of claimant to a particular fund to which there are two or more claimants. Thereupon the judicial power invoked is complete, and, having been exercised, a result follows, a determined and final result, such a result as is necessary to the full investiture of a court with judicial power, properly speaking.

Then comes in the residue of this bill, and, as it seems to me, a very proper bill in that respect. If the judicial tribunals shall so exercise judicial power as to leave no claimant to the fund in the hands of the United States, then the legislative power, so far as that is necessary to be exercised in order to the exertion of the political power of the Government, legislates to commit the disposition of the fund as between the United States and Mexico to the President of the United States. Thus here is in that case in this bill the simple, ordinary illustration of legislation to be operative upon a contingency, a contingency which is not a delegation of legislative power, a proper contingency, the contingency of a result in the exercise of a proper judicial power.

I make these suggestions, as I said, without any purpose to debate this bill, but merely to present the view I entertain in respect to it, and in the hope that it may thus be so perfected as to obviate objections before it is determined that the honor of the United States, so far engaged, at least, as to have challenged the judgment of a majority of the committee, ought to be made the subject of such an inquiry as shall enable it to be at rest.

I ask that the proposed amendments may be printed.

Mr. DOLPH. I will ask the Senator if his amendments are so prepared that they show what parts are to be stricken out and what parts to be inserted in the original bill.

Mr. VILAS. Yes, sir. I ask that the amendments may be printed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The order to print will be made, in the absence of objection.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. President, the second section of this bill provides:

That full jurisdiction is hereby conferred on the Court of Claims to hear and determine such suit and to make all interlocutory and final decrees therein, as the evidence may warrant, according to the principles of equity and justice.

I suppose the term "equity" as used here has reference to that legal equity which is recognized by the courts. So the court is clothed with authority to render final decree, final upon the rights of the parties, final surely with respect to the parties who are to be made defendants in this proceeding, the claimants of this fund.

That full jurisdiction is hereby conferred on the Court of Claims to hear and determine such suit and to make all interlocutory and final decrees therein, as the evidence may warrant, according to the principles of equity and justice, and to enforce the same by injunction or any proper final process, and in all respects to proceed in said cause according to law and the rules of said court, so far as the same are applicable.

Assuming that the Court of Claims will acquire complete jurisdiction over these parties by the methods prescribed by the proposed act, I am at a loss to determine what language can be more forcible than that employed in this section of the bill. Its authority is to adjudge the rights of these parties finally, and its authority is to issue injunction or other process so as to compel obedience to its final orders. If, then, the rights of parties are adjudged finally, and if their obedience is compelled by process adapted to that end, what more can be done?

It has been suggested, however, that there are two parties to this controversy, and the United States must be regarded here under this bill as a mere litigant. It offers to submit its rights to this court. This adjudication would be final against the United States as well as against the claimants, and thus, I understand, a final judicial determination or disposing of the rights of parties absolutely is to be reached by the Court of Claims. That being so, I am utterly unable to understand the objection that the Supreme Court would not have final jurisdiction on appeal.

After the Court of Claims has finally adjudicated upon all the questions made by the bill and submitted to its jurisdiction, it is provided further that the United States, not in aid of the jurisdiction of the court at all, but to furnish a mode for the satisfaction of the orders of the court, in the event of the decision of the court in favor of these claimants, directs that then the decree of the court shall be satisfied by the payment of money.

This proceeding, being a suit at law in respect to a question made judicial by this bill, and this court being empowered to render a final decree, or, in other words, to bring parties into court involuntarily, and to adjudge their rights finally, and to enforce obedience by legitimate process, I am at a loss to know what more can be done in respect to disposing of the rights of private parties. That decision the United States consents shall be final as to its rights, and then the bill makes provision for the satisfaction of whatever orders may be made against the United States.

I conclude, therefore, that while it may be true (although I confess I do not yet quite perceive how)—while the bill might in some respects be made more formal, I am at a loss to know how it can be made in substance more expressive than it is.

Mr. DOLPH. Now let the question be put on the request of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] in regard to voting on the bill.

Mr. TELLER. Let us vote on the bill now.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Oregon restate the request?

Mr. DOLPH. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] requested unanimous consent that unless some Senator desired to speak at that time, at 3 o'clock on Monday the Senate should vote on the bill under consideration, and immediately following that that the vote should be taken on the Weil bill.

Mr. PADDOCK. I thought the Senator from Alabama modified his proposition so as to make the hour 2 o'clock instead of 3.

Mr. DOLPH. I understood 3 o'clock to be the time named.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request made by the Senator from Alabama? The Chair hears none.

Mr. HOAR. I do not rise to discuss at this time the question which has been raised, whether this bill undertakes to impose upon the Supreme Court a duty which it is not possible for Congress to impose on it under the Constitution. I should like an opportunity to look over the remarks of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], which I have not had an opportunity to do and which I did not hear in full, before renewing that discussion as far as I am concerned.

I wish to say, however, that I understand the principle of law to be this: That, in the first place, we can not impose, under the Constitution, upon the Supreme Court of the United States the duty of ascertaining facts or of declaring rules of law or equity merely for the sake of giving advice to other departments of the Government or of furnishing them rules upon which they, in their legal discretion, are to act. The Supreme Court must render, if anything, what is recognized as a final judgment between parties, determining finally their rights according to principles of law furnished by the lawmaking power.

In the next place, what is involved in what I have just said, the Supreme Court can not be authorized to render such a final decree which shall be binding and conclusive on the rights of parties if that decree is to be founded not upon previously existing rules of law or upon a rule of law prescribed by the lawmaking power, by the statute-making power if it is to be a statute, but in accordance with a rule adopted by the Supreme Court for the purposes of the case in accordance with its view of what may be just and equitable.

Neither of those two things can we require the Supreme Court to do, to find fact or law which is not to be the subject of its own conclusive and final decree, in the first place, or to make a final decree in the second place, which is to be founded not on a law prescribed to it by another power, but on its own sense of what is just or equitable, being formulated according to a rule which it creates itself for the case.

The objection to the appeal provided in this bill to the Supreme Court of the United States is that it does not undertake to do what, as I understand, the honorable Senator from Illinois [Mr. PALMER] thinks it does—authorize the Supreme Court to settle legal or equitable rights now existing; but it authorizes the Court of Claims and the Supreme Court on appeal to do in regard to this fund what they think equitable and just. The word equity being known by its associate, noscitur a sociis, the term "justice," when they say that in dealing with this fund, considering all our relations with a foreign power and our relations to this corporation and to citizens who have succeeded to its claims, it undertakes to refer to the Supreme Court what it is reasonable and just for us to do.

I rose, however, at the present time to call the attention of the Senate and the Senator from Alabama to the statute of 1887, which the Senator cited as a precedent for this bill. I am reported as saying, when the Senator appealed to me and asked me whether I was in the Senate at that time, "I have not had the opportunity of refreshing my recollection in regard to that act, and I do not remember that I had any connection with it myself." What I said was that I had a connection with it myself, and in fact drew one of the sections to amend that act.

The Senator from Alabama seems to me entirely to misunderstand that act. He reads some of the sections providing for suits against the United States either in the district courts or in the Court of Claims, or in some cases of concurrent jurisdiction in the district courts of the United States and the Court of Claims, and then for an appeal to the Supreme Court and a final decree. That, of course, is all right. Nobody ever questioned that where a citizen had a claim against the United States founded upon a tort of one of the agents of the Government, founded upon a collision at sea with a Government vessel, where the managers of the vessel were at fault, founded upon a Government bond or other contract, founded on an implied obligation of the Government, where the circumstances of the case would create a legal obligation if the case had arisen between citizens which could be enforced in the courts, where the claim against the United States was only invalid because there was no provision for suing the Government, nobody ever doubted, so far as I know, that we might lawfully and constitutionally give to any court of the United States original jurisdiction of such claim and allow a citizen to sue in that court, and give appellate jurisdiction to the Supreme Court of the United States to make a final judgment, although that final judgment would be enforced not by an execution or other like process in the ordinary way, a writ of injunction, mandatory, or otherwise, but could only be enforced by an appropriation by Congress. That is one thing. We did that in the Bowman act.

In the first eight or nine sections we provided the mechanism and gave the remedy. Then we provided for an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States. Then we went on and enacted the twelfth section, which the Senator from Alabama read and said in reading it, that that is one of the sections which he included in the bill, and the remedy by that section might be further prosecuted by an appeal to the Supreme Court. There is where I take issue with the honorable Senator in regard to the twelfth section. That was a provision that where any Department of the Government or either House of Congress had before it a matter requiring an investigation into facts or involving difficult or doubtful questions of law, that matter might be referred to the Court of Claims for its advice for two reasons: In the first place, that the United States might be represented and there might be a hearing upon the facts, and, secondly, that counsel, who could not so conveniently appear before committees of Congress, might make such suggestions as they had to make in regard to the law.

But in both those cases there was no thought on the part of the committee framing the statute or on the part of Congress when it was enacted, that an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States should lie, but, on the contrary, the only provision is that in that case the Court of Claims shall report its conclusions to the Department of the Government or to the House of Congress which had sent the case for its consideration. So that statute is not only not an authority for the proceeding now proposed, but is, so far as the legislative precedents are concerned, a direct authority the other way.

I have the profoundest deference for the judgment of the Senator from Alabama. I think the Committee on Foreign Relations have shown great wisdom and are entitled to our gratitude for having wrought out this method of getting rid of this complicated and troublesome affair; but it does seem to me that it is safer and better, that everybody will be satisfied and every right will be preserved by leaving this to the decision of the Court of Claims, on whom we may impose any duty of any kind and not embarrass it by an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, which, in the first place, must occasion great delay, and, in the next place, is of very doubtful constitutionality.

Mr. MORGAN. I should like to add just a word in reply to the Senator from Massachusetts on the last branch of the proposition.

I see that section 12 of the act referred to does include those determinations of law or fact by any court upon whom we confer jurisdiction to which section 9 of this act applies.

Mr. HOAR. That was put after section 9.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes; that was put after section 9.

SEC. 9. That the plaintiff or the United States, in any suit brought under the provisions of this act, shall have the same rights of appeal or writ of error as are now reserved in the statutes of the United States, etc.

Then the question, of course, is whether or not the provision of section 12 includes the words "any suit."

That when any claim or matter may be pending in any of the Executive Departments—

Not before Congress, but a claim pending in an Executive Department—which involves controverted questions of fact or law, the head of such Department, with the consent of the claimant, may transmit the same, with the vouchers, papers, proofs, and documents pertaining thereto, to said Court of Claims, and the same shall be there proceeded in under such rules as the court may adopt.

May take further testimony and reject testimony.

Mr. HOAR. Read on.

Mr. MORGAN. It continues:

When the facts and conclusions of law shall have been found, the court shall report its findings to the Department by which it was transmitted.

Mr. HOAR. Yes.

Mr. MORGAN. Very good. That is a judicial proceeding through and through. It can not be denied that it is judicial, because the court can take proof, they can hear and determine questions of law and questions of fact, and that is all any court can do, except that some courts can render final judgments in certain cases and others can not in other cases.

Now we come to section 13, and that is the section which applies to claims that are pending in Congress.

SEC. 13. That in every case which shall come before the Court of Claims or is now pending therein, under the provisions of an act entitled "An act to afford assistance and relief to Congress and the Executive Departments in the investigation of claims and demands against the Government," approved March 3, 1883, if it shall appear to the satisfaction of the court, upon the facts established, that it has jurisdiction to render judgment or decree thereon under existing laws or under the provisions of this act, it shall proceed to do so, giving to either party such further opportunity for hearing as in its judgment justice shall require, and report its proceedings therein to either House of Congress or to the Department by which the same was referred to said court.

That is a final judgment, but it depends upon Congress to make the appropriation. In the other case it does not depend upon Congress to make the appropriation, because it is a claim that the law authorized to be considered by and referred to the executive department, and there it stops, and that is a fact, that the money to pay the claim is supplied perhaps by a standing appropriation. Now we come to the next section:

SEC. 14. That whenever any bill, except for a pension, shall be pending in either House of Congress providing for the payment of a claim against the United States, legal or equitable, or for a grant, gift, or bounty to any person, the House in which such bill is pending may refer the same to the Court of Claims—who shall proceed with the same in accordance with the provisions of the act approved March 3, 1883, entitled "An act to afford assistance and relief to Congress and the Executive Departments in the investigation of claims and demands against the Government," and report to such House the facts in the case and the amount, where the same can be liquidated, including any facts bearing upon the question whether there has been delay or laches in presenting such claim or applying for such grant, gift, or bounty, and any facts bearing upon the question whether the bar of any statute of limitation should be removed or which shall be claimed to excuse the claimant for not having resorted to any established legal remedy.

That is not a suit by a party or by the consent of the party. It is a proceeding on the part of the House on its own motion—

In that case no judgment is rendered. That is mere advice given to the Houses of Congress in which they can recommend, if the court please to do so, that it is equitable in its character, about which the circumstances are so peculiar that it would be proper in the opinion of the court for Congress to remove the bar, implying, of course, that it would require new legislation to accomplish what the court itself had recommended should be done, and in these other cases it does not require new legislation. In one of them it requires an appropriation to be made, and in the other it is a direction to an executive officer that he shall pay the money. It has been overlooked. I have not tried to argue this part of the bill with any degree of accuracy, because I am entirely satisfied that the Senate should take any course on it that it pleases. It is only a question of difference amongst lawyers as to which is the best course. The Senate will observe that this bill provides for a jurisdiction in behalf of the Court of Claims, and of course the Supreme Court, to issue a final injunction or any other form of injunction, interlocutory, for instance, and that of itself implies the power to render a final decree, for it very often happens that you can not render a money decree or a property decree, but you can enjoin a man perpetually from setting up a claim or demand in equity, or pretending to do it, and cut him off from his remedy, and that is a final judgment in the most complete sense of the word.

Mr. HOAR. Could you enjoin him against presenting a petition to a Department or to Congress, which is all that can be done now?

Mr. MORGAN. I do not know about that. That may be accomplished under the Constitution, and you can certainly enjoin him from bringing suit. There is no question about that. You have got a receiver in your court. There is a man disposed to harass him. The court can enjoin that party from suing that receiver. "You shall not present your claim to him. You shall not do anything to him. If you do, we will put you in jail." It is an inequitable demand and you must not press it. That is the nature of the judgment.

I believe we are debating a matter here which is of no substantial value. I think so, but I am satisfied with any form of words, and I am pleased with the words which are indicated by the Senator from Wisconsin in the change of phraseology of the bill. I think, perhaps, it makes the bill clearer, but we will look at those amendments when they are printed and come to some agreement about them which will, I hope, satisfy everybody. I have no pride of opinion in what I have had to say about this matter.

Mr. CHILTON. Will the Senator from Alabama allow me to interrupt him to ask a question which seems pertinent to this discussion?

Mr. MORGAN. Certainly.

Mr. CHILTON. As I understand the proposition made by the Senator from Massachusetts, it is that while the Court of Claims can undoubtedly be invested with the authority to determine this matter, it is rather as a board of arbitration or agency of Congress than as a part of the judicial machinery of the country, recognized by the Constitution. It has seemed to me that the "controversy" or "case" of which the courts are given jurisdiction by this bill was simply an issue as to the fraudulent character of the Weil and La Abra awards. While perhaps technically no court could entertain a direct suit to set aside the award of an international commission, yet the question as to whether it was fraudulent or not might be constituted a subject for judicial determination, and if so, the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court could be provided for in the bill.

But the very fact that a lawyer of such distinction as the Senator from Massachusetts finds room for doubt in regard to the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court is enough to cause some further consideration of the form of the measure, and it occurred to me to propound this inquiry to the Senator from Alabama. Suppose that the pending bill is passed, the litigation is instituted in the Court of Claims, and upon its judgment being rendered an appeal is taken to the Supreme Court of the United States. If that Court should then decide that an appeal did not lie, could it be held under the phraseology of the bill that the appeal was such an essential part of the remedy provided for that when the appeal fell to the ground the whole proposition or project fell with it?

It seems to me, if such a result is possible, it would be very desirable that such language should be used in the law that its whole vigor will not depend upon that section which authorizes an appeal, and that even if that jurisdiction should not be sustained we would still have an end, by the judgment of the Court of Claims, of this long-labored inquiry which has been so ably presented by the Senator from Alabama and other Senators during this debate.

Mr. MORGAN. The appeal could not fall to the ground under the judgment of the Supreme Court otherwise than by that court declaring that it could not take jurisdiction. That is all the reason there is for it. If we put a provision in the bill that that court shall have jurisdiction and it decides that we can not confer it, of course that ends the appeal, but it does not at all affect the antecedent provisions which make the judgment of the Court of Claims final because the Supreme Court can not entertain the appeal.

But that difficulty is removed by the case of Sampeyreac, which the Senator must have had in his mind when he made such a clear statement of the precise purpose of the bill, which was not to open up an inquiry into the merits of these claims but a naked inquiry into the question whether the awards had been obtained by fraud or perjury or fraudulent practice; that is all. That was done exactly in that form in the case of Sampeyreac, which I have read here from my desk. In that case there was not a bill of review.

The Supreme Court expressly said that it was not in the nature of a bill of review, but it was the exercise of a jurisdiction by the circuit court of Arkansas upon a special statute enacted for a special case, after a decree had been passed in favor of Sampeyreac, and after the time for appeal from that decree had expired, and it was to all intents and purposes a final and irrevocable decree so far as the power of the judiciary was concerned. Congress came in and gave to the court jurisdiction to hear and determine the question whether that decree had been obtained by fraud, and the court entertained the jurisdiction, and the Supreme Court entertained an appeal under that very statute and decided the case, affirming the decision of the court below, which it could not have done, of course, unless it had jurisdiction.

Mr. CHILTON. Before the Senator takes his seat I wish to state that I had in my mind a case or cases that I remember to have read in some of the reports where certain inferior courts had been invested with jurisdiction to determine election contests and a right of appeal had been given to the supreme court. When a case in point went to the supreme court of the State in which it arose, it was decided that the election contest was a political question, and that jurisdiction to determine it by appeal could not be conferred upon the supreme court.

Mr. MORGAN. That was because there was another tribunal under the constitution of that State, I suppose, which had the right to determine upon the elections, return, and qualifications of its members.

Mr. CHILTON. No, sir; it was a political question—it was a question of officers—and after it was decided that the right of appeal could not be exercised, it was held that the whole statute fell to the ground, because the section giving the appeal was such an essential part of the remedy provided or created that it could not be supposed that the law-making power would pass the statute with that part of it omitted. That is the point I wish to make.

Mr. MORGAN. A similar decision was made twice in the State of Alabama in our supreme court, in which they held that the law was unconstitutional—these were criminal laws—which undertook to make final disposition of an offense, a misdemeanor I think it was, without giving an appeal, in fact cutting off an appeal to the supreme court. They held it was unconstitutional, and why? Because our supreme court there had revisory power over the inferior courts in every matter. It being a constitutional right, the legislature could not take away from that court or from the party that privilege. But the Supreme Court of the United States have that sort of a revisory power.

When the Congress of the United States gave the Supreme Court of the United States the power to issue mandates, injunctions, mandamuses, and writs of habeas corpus, it was decided that because they did not expressly include writs of prohibition that court could not issue a writ of prohibition except to a court of admiralty.

Why? Because the jurisdiction in admiralty as it existed under the English law was expressly taken up in the Constitution and by terms conferred upon the Supreme Court, but the jurisdiction to issue writs of prohibition was not included in express terms or by necessary reference in the terms of the Constitution, and the Congress of the United States having provided that they might issue writs of mandamus, writs of injunction, of quo warranto, and habeas corpus—I believe those were the writs included—having included those it must be construed that that was as far as Congress intended to go; and therefore, writs of prohibition not being included they could not be granted. I have been trying ever since I have been here to get Congress to confer the power upon the Supreme Court of the United States to grant writs of prohibition.

Now, there is the difference in the two cases. The Constitution of the United States investing the judicial power in the Supreme Court and the inferior courts, attended that investiture of power in the next section with the provision that Congress should regulate and provide what appeals should be heard in the Supreme Court. The jurisdiction, as I read to-day from the authorities, is conferred by the Constitution of the United States and is plenary; there is nothing to interfere with it except the will of Congress; and we admeasure to the Supreme Court from time to time in our enactments the procedure and also the right to exercise the jurisdiction in various classes of cases; I do not mean the original but the appellate jurisdiction. There is the difference.

I was a little afraid of the proposition suggested by the Senator from Texas, that perhaps if we did not include the right of appeal here the point might be made that we had violated the Constitution of the United States by cutting it off, especially after the debate which has gone on here. It is a very much safer procedure, in my judgment, that we should put the right of appeal in the bill, and then if the Supreme Court of the United States should decide that after all we did not have authority to put it there, they can merely discard the case from their jurisdiction, and that leaves the judgment of the Court of Claims absolutely final, particularly as this proposed act confers upon the Court of Claims, as I have said before, the right to make injunctions final, and an injunction is really the final process contemplated in this measure, that a final injunction shall be imposed upon these people from setting up this pretense any further, upon the ground that they have an equity upon this fund, and when that is done by a court, then the President of the United States is instructed by the bill to pay the money to Mexico. That is an appropriation; that is a different thing.

APPENDIX A.

[Fifty-second Congress, first session. Senate Ex. Doc. No. 20.]

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, TRANSMITTING A REPORT OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE, IN RESPONSE TO SENATE RESOLUTION OF JANUARY 12, REGARDING CERTAIN CLAIMS PROVIDED FOR BY A CONVENTION BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES AND MEXICO.

January 19, 1892.—Read, laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

To the Senate of the United States:

I transmit herewith to the Senate a report of the Secretary of State, in answer to the resolution of the Senate of the 12th instant, making inquiries regarding payments of the awards of the Claims Commission under the convention of July 4, 1868, between the United States and Mexico.

BENJ. HARRISON.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, January 18, 1892.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington January 14, 1892.

The Secretary of State has the honor to submit herewith a report in answer to the resolution of the Senate of the United States of the 12th instant, respecting the awards of the Mixed Claims Commission which sat at Washington under the convention of July 4, 1868, between the United States and Mexico.

The awards of the Commission were rendered in Mexican gold, American gold, and American currency. By the terms of the protocol between the Secretary of State and the Mexican minister, under date of January 31, 1878, the various currencies were reduced to the basis of American gold. Upon this basis the net indebtedness of Mexico to the United States by reason of the awards was ascertained to be $3,865,498.42.

This amount was paid in full to the United States by Mexico in fourteen annual installments, in perfect accordance with the terms of the convention, the final payment having been made January 21, 1890.

The ascertainment of the proportionate share of each of the awards, numbering in all 187, in the total sum of the indemnity, is set forth in detail in the annexed table, marked "A."

Nearly all of these awards have been paid in full to the awardees or their assigns, the principal exceptions being the awards in favor of Benjamin Weil and La Abra Mining Company.

There is at present on deposit to the credit of the Secretary of State with the assistant treasurer of the United States at New York, on account of all awards of the Commission, the sum of $709,908.57.

Of this amount the sums of $287,833.77 and $408,030.08 are withheld, respectively, on account of the awards rendered in favor of Benjamin Weil and the La Abra Silver Mining Company. These sums aggregate $695,863.85, thus leaving of the sum above stated as being in the hands of the Secretary of State only $10,104.72 yet to be distributed on account of outstanding interests among the other 185 awards. Deaths of the principals and failure of their administrators or executors to present their claims for the balances due them are the only causes why this sum of $10,104.72 remains undistributed. It is reasonable, however, to expect that the persons entitled to this remainder will present themselves in the near future.

In specific answer to that portion of the resolution which inquires "the amount of any award made under said convention that has been refused payment by the State Department, and what person or persons are now the claimants of interests in said awards, the payment of which has been refused," I have the honor to state that payments have been refused only in the two cases above referred to, namely, those of Benjamin Weil and the La Abra Mining Company, and that the annexed transcripts, marked B and C from the Department's docket, show in detail the dates and amounts of payment made on these awards, respectively, and the persons to whom paid, as well as briefs of the instruments on file in the Department showing what persons are the claimants of interests in these awards.

In answer to the concluding inquiry of the resolution, I have the honor to state that at no time has any part of the moneys received from Mexico been invested.

Respectfully submitted.

JAMES G. BLAINE.

To the PRESIDENT.

Power of attorney (copy of) from B. Weil to Philip B. Fouke, document marked I, filed December 12, 1881.

CITY OF NEW ORLEANS, State of Louisiana, July 15, 1874.

Know all men by these presents, that I, Benjamin Weil, of the city of New Orleans and State of Louisiana, have nominated, appointed, and substituted, and by these presents do nominate, appoint, and substitute Philip B. Fouke, of Washington City, District of Columbia, my true and lawful attorney for the following purposes, to wit:

Whereas Messrs. Fouke & Key are my attorneys for the prosecution of a certain claim before the Joint Commission of the United States of America and the United States of Mexico, which said claim is now before said Joint Commission; now in order to defray expenses, fees, and other moneys expended, laid out, or appropriated in and about the prosecution of said claim, I do hereby fully authorize and empower him, the said Philip B. Fouke, for me and in my name, to pay, pledge, hypothecate, any portion of said claim for said purpose; provided, however, the amount thus paid, pledged, or hypothecated, shall not exceed the amount and sum of $100,000.

In witness whereof I have hereunto affixed my hand and seal at the city of New Orleans, State of Louisiana, this 15th day of July, A. D. 1874.

Interlineation of the word "claim," on the eleventh line, approved.

B. WEIL. [SEAL.]

Affidavit.

STATE OF LOUISIANA, PARISH OF ORLEANS,
City of Orleans, ss:

Be it known that on this 15th day of July, 1874, before me, George William Christy, a notary public in and for the city and parish of Orleans, State of Louisiana, duly commissioned and qualified, personally appeared Benjamin Weil, to me personally known to be the party who signed and executed the foregoing power of attorney in favor of Philip B. Fouke, who acknowledged that he signed, sealed, and executed the same for the purposes therein stated.

In witness whereof I hereunto sign my name and affix my seal of office on the day and date aforesaid.

GEO. W. CHRISTY, Notary Public.

WASHINGTON, D. C., November 8, 1875.

I certify that the foregoing is a true copy of the original in my possession.
[SEAL.] JOHN J. KEY.

Agreement between Fouke and Boynton, filed December 12, 1881.

This agreement, entered into this 5th day of January, A. D. 1875, by and between Benjamin Weil, of the city of New Orleans, State of Louisiana, by Philip B. Fouke, his attorney in fact, for the purposes hereinafter mentioned, and Philip B. Fouke and John J. Key, attorneys at law, of Washington City, D. C., and attorneys of record in the case of said Weil, hereinafter referred to and mentioned, who with said Weil, are parties of the first part, and Sylvanus C. Boynton, of Washington City, D. C., the party of the second part,

Witnesseth, that the said parties of the first part, in consideration of moneys advanced by, and of expenses paid by, and personal and professional services rendered by, the party of the second part to the parties of the first part, for the preparation and prosecution of a certain case hereinafter stated, and for the further consideration of the covenant hereinafter mentioned of the party of the second part, do covenant and agree with the said party of the second part, to pay him, the said party of the second part, the sum of $70,000 of the award in a certain case now before and to be adjudged by the Joint Commission of the United States of America and the United States of Mexico, and which, ultimately, may be before and adjudged by the umpire of said Commission, now in session under a treaty between the said Governments, made on the 4th day of July, A. D. 1868, to wit, the case of Benjamin Weil (vide dockets, No. 447) of the city of New Orleans and State of Louisiana, said claim is for the sum of $335,950, with interest thereon from the 30th of September, A. D. 1864.

And the said party of the second part, in consideration of the covenants of the said parties of the first part, doth covenant and agree with the said parties of the first part that he will devote his time and attention to said case and to the procuring of an award, giving his personal and professional services in aid and furtherance of said case up to the time such award shall be finally made or the decision finally be rendered. And the said party of the second part further agrees that, should the final award be made for a less sum than said sum of $335,950, with interest from said 30th September, A. D. 1864, then the party of the second part shall only receive pro rata as to the amount awarded as $70,000 bears to the whole amount claimed.

And the party of the second part agrees that he will not take any other case or have any interest in any other case pending, or which may come before said Commission or umpire thereof, but is to give his entire personal and legal services to prosecuting to a successful award in the case herein mentioned.

It is agreed by the parties hereto that the party of the second part shall be secured in the amount agreed upon to be paid, and for that purpose the party of the second part shall have a lien on said award for the payment of the same, and the amount herein secured to the party of the second part is to be paid from the proceeds of said award whenever the same shall be paid.

This agreement is to be in full force and effect from the date hereof, but to be null and void if no final award is obtained.

BENJ. WEIL,
By P. B. FONKE,
Attorney in Fact.

FONKE & KEY,
Attorneys at Law and Attorneys of Record.
SYLVESTER C. BOYNTON.

Receipt of Thos. L. Young to Lambert B. Cain, document marked M, filed December 12, 1881.

WASHINGTON, D. C., August 20, 1880.

Received of Lambert B. Cain $3,265.68, his proportion of fee charged by me, and which is due me now on the first four installments paid by the Secretary of State of the United States in the case of Benjamin Weil against the United States.

THOS. L. YOUNG.

Agreement between Benjamin Weil and Emile Landner, filed March 21, 1884.

The agreement made and entered into in the city of New Orleans, State of Louisiana, between Benjamin Weil, of the first part, and Emile Landner, of the second part, both residents of the city and State before mentioned:

Witnesseth, Benjamin Weil, of the first part, does hereby agree, pledge, and bind himself, his heirs or assigns, to pay to Emile Landner, of the second part (for and in consideration of services rendered by said Emile Landner in the hereinafter-described claim), the sum of $7,500 in United States currency out of the proceeds of the Mexican Claims Commission at Washington, D. C.

This done in New Orleans this 16th day of March, 1872, in the presence of the two undersigned competent witnesses. If the amount collected by B. Weil on the above claim does not exceed the sum of $50,000 the said Emile Landner agrees to accept the sum of $5,000, United States currency.

B. WEIL.
E. LANDNER.

Witness:
P. W. SOLOMON.

[Indorsement.]

I hereby transfer the within claim in consideration of value received, to the order of D. Roos.

NEW ORLEANS, May 26, 1876.

EMILE LANDNER.

Letter from John J. Key to L. B. Cain, filed March 21, 1884.

No. 459 PENNSYLVANIA AVENUE,
Washington, D. C., September 28, 1875.

DEAR SIR: Immediately on receipt of letter August 30 ultimo I acknowledge receipt of draft for $25; also wrote in full on the Weil matter. The proceedings in New Orleans having legally constituted Mrs. Weil the guardian of the lunatic, she is now empowered to make you her attorney to transact any business connected with the estate of B. Weil. That power of appointment exists unless the letters of guardianship are revoked by the court or Weil recovers his mind. Should an award be made I will inform you what steps are necessary for you to take.

It can not be more than a few weeks before the umpire will return his opinion in both yours and Weil's case. God grant he may do right and pay what is so justly due. He has decided almost every case against the American claimants. All force loan and contract cases he has dismissed; so we can not recover on the money taken from us. Great indignation is felt here against him, and some hard things will be said this winter about him in Congress, but that won't help the unfortunate claimants who have been denied justice. I shall telegraph good news and let the mail carry bad. We are all absolutely starving; business is prostrated and the Government pays nothing she can possible help from doing. I hope this letter will reach you.

Yours truly,

JOHN J. KEY.

L. B. CAIN, Esq.

Letter from Messrs. John J. Key and P. B. Fonke, to Messrs. L. B. Cain and Gen. H. T. Hays, filed March 21, 1884.

No. 459 PENNSYLVANIA AVENUE,
Washington, D. C., October 8, 1875.

GENTLEMEN: Mr. Cain was informed by letter from Mr. Key that an award has been given in the Benj. Weil case of Mexico for $285,000 in gold Mexican dollars, with interest from the 20th day of September, 1864, to the close of the labors of the Commission. It is important that Mr. Cain should come on as early as possible, so as the attorney of Mrs. Weil, who is the conservator or guardian of Weil, to arrange the various interests in the case as set forth in writing. Mr. Key wishes this done as soon as possible, as attorney and agreement are given to him individually. Gen. Hay's presence is wished, so he and Fonke can arrange the interests of themselves; also as a party in interest. All matters may be done to the satisfaction of all. Mr. Key personally wishes to have him here. The interests of all are large, and should at once be attended to. As early a day as possible the presence of both of you is wished for.

Gen. Hays will be able to inform all parties the extent of the powers invested in Mr. Cain by the written authority of Mr. Weil.

Very respectfully,

JOHN J. KEY.
P. B. FONKE.

L. B. CAIN, Esq., and Gen. H. P. HAYS.

Please answer promptly. By the time Mr. Cain can get here his case will be more than probably be decided.

Letter from John J. Key to L. B. Cain, filed March 21, 1884.

No. 459 PENNSYLVANIA AVENUE,
Washington, D. C., October 16, 1875.

DEAR SIR: Your letter of October 11, 1875, was received this morning, and it is so important I hasten to answer it.

I will first call your attention to the claim of certain parties in New Orleans, who claim to have an interest in the claim of B. Weil. You can not be too circumspect and cautious in your intercourse with them. Permit me to say, if I was holding your relations with Weil that I would say that everything should be done by me that Weil would have done if he had continued in sound mind to the present time, and that you know he (Weil) conversed with and confided in Col. Fonke, and that Fonke will be able to instruct you and give you information.

Make no issue with any one and deal with them by general promises, not binding, that each and all will be satisfied with your action. This is necessary, as Weil was compelled to promise certain parties that he would help them if they would tell the truth. The award is returned to the office of the Commissioners, but can not be entered until next month, when the Commission meets. Although every witness swore only to the truth, some of them might make trouble if Weil promises, as they claim, were at this time refused. Weil is a good man and told me he intended to do right. When I see you both Fonke and myself will tell you all we know; until then deal with anyone who comes to you as suggested. Col. Fonke bids me say as to De Castro he and Hays recognize their agreement, but both have advanced money to De Castro, and you had better wait for consultation with them; and he does not wish you to advance to De Castro. Of this I know nothing and have no personal interest. I shall govern myself with all parties by the agreement in writing signed by me.

As to the interest of all parties except those you refer to in your letter, written agreements are signed, and so clearly sets forth the rights of all, you will have no difficulty in settling with each party.

There is a matter set forth in writing of party in interest that can only be explained by a personal interview. It will meet with your sanction and, although perfectly proper, the knowledge of the same, at any rate for the present, should be confined to you, Fonke, Hays, and myself. I would answer your inquiry distinctly as to the interest of all parties but it is at this time unnecessary.

You ask if the award can be sold. I answer yes; but terms vary; there is no fixed market value for such, but depend on many causes, such as ability of parties to negotiate, etc. There is but little doubt that the award can be sold. If all matters connected with transfer can be made satisfactory it will bring 60 cents at least in money of the United States.

Now the important matter on the subject of transfer are your powers under your power of attorney from Mrs. Weil. Have authenticated copies of the orders of court, making her conservator or guardian of B. Weil, as an insane person; also have your power of attorney recorded, and bring also a certified copy of the same; have the clerk's certified copy, also certified by the judge of the court.

Now, come on at once. Fonke has written to Hays in Virginia, and I shall telegraph you if he comes here. Your case will soon be decided, and, as far as I can see, must be favorable.

Yours, truly,

JOHN J. KEY.

S. B. CAIN, Esq.

STATE OF LOUISIANA, PARISH OF ORLEANS,
City of New Orleans:

I, Edgar A. Luminais, clerk of the civil district court for the parish of Orleans, do hereby certify that the foregoing eighteen pages do contain true and correct copies of certain documents filed in the cases of Joseph C. Morris vs. Mrs. Caroline Cain and Adolph Marks, testamentary executor of L. B. Cain and P. S. Weltz, public administrator of the succession of Benjamin Weil vs. Caroline Cain and Adolph Marks, testamentary executor of L. B. Cain, instituted in this court and in the records thereof, under the numbers 3127 and 3394.

In testimony whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the impress of the seal of said court at the city of New Orleans on this 11th day of April, in the year of our Lord 1890, and in the one hundred and fourteenth year of the Independence of the United States of America.

[SEAL.] E. A. LUMINAIS, Clerk.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. HAWLEY. I am sorry to trouble the Senate at this hour, but I should like a brief executive session. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, February 1, 1892, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate January 28, 1892.

MEMBER BOARD OF ORDNANCE AND FORTIFICATIONS.

Byron M. Cutcheon, of Michigan, for appointment as a civilian member of the Board of Ordnance and Fortifications, to date from July 1, 1891, the date of his temporary appointment as such.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, January 28, 1892.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read, and, after correction, approved.

CHIPPEWA INDIANS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, submitting amended estimates to those submitted heretofore for the relief and civilization of the Chippewa Indians for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1893; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

PUBLIC BUILDING, EASTPORT, ME.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, requesting that an appropriation be made for the United States custom-house and post-office building at Eastport, Me.; that the same may be completed, and said item included in the urgent deficiency estimates; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

PROPAGATION OF FOOD FISHES.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Secretary of State, submitting an estimate for an appropriation to reimburse the appropriation for the propagation of food fishes for the fiscal year 1892; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

BUILDINGS AT MILITARY POSTS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Acting Secretary of War, transmitting a copy of a letter from the Second Comptroller, recommending the insertion in the sundry civil bill for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1893, of a proviso in connection with the appropriation for the construction of buildings at and the enlargement of such military posts as in the judgment of the Secretary of War may be necessary; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

A. B. CRENSHAW ET AL. VS. THE UNITED STATES.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting copies of the findings of the court in the cases of the following-named persons against the United States: A. B. Crenshaw, J. H. Humphreys, and John Kannell; which was referred to the Committee on War Claims.

Also, a copy of the findings of the court in the case of David Lynch, deceased, against the United States; which was referred to the Committee on War Claims.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to Mr. GORMAN to withdraw from the files of the House of the Forty-sixth Congress papers in the case of Jacob H. Starke without leaving copies.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. WARWICK, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. 28) to amend an act entitled "An act granting the right of way to the Hutchison and Southern Railroad Company through the Indian Territory;" and

A bill (H. R. 517) providing for the completion of the allotment of lands to the Cheyenne and Arapahoe Indians.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message, in writing, from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries.

THE RULES.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the report of the Committee on Rules, and I yield so much time as he may desire to my friend the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN].

Mr. MCMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, the important duty devolves upon the House of determining the code of rules by which it shall govern itself during this and the succeeding session of this Congress. There are very important measures coming before Congress for consideration. Second only in importance to these is the question of how they shall be considered. By the success or failure of the methods will come success or failure of the legislation.

From man's first aspirations for free government the question has been how to govern him and still leave him free. That question comes equally when you apply it to a legislative body, how to govern it, or permit it to govern itself rather, and still be free. Two systems of rules are proposed to this body: the one the system that is recommended by the Committee on Rules, which is a system that may be said to be the growth of legislative rules and rulings in this country for an hundred years. It departs very little from that long line of legislative conduct which has characterized this Government, first, under the old Federal and Whig administrations, then under the Democratic administration, then under Republican administration, and then again under Democratic administration.

There were certain fixed principles to which this legislative body has adhered through a century, and they were never infracted, however great the clamor for their breaking, until one hundred years of our legislative history had elapsed. Then the exigencies, if I may say so candidly, seemed to the Fifty-first Congress to demand extraordinary work, and extraordinary methods had to be resorted to. For a hundred years no Speaker from that chair had ever presumed or assumed to count any one as participating in any legislation for any purpose who did not actually participate. When a very important measure, known as the force bill, was being considered, when the mad passions that had been engendered by fierce war had not yet subsided, even then there was coolness enough on the part of the presiding officer of this House [Mr. Blaine] to say "No, my predecessors have ruled that a quorum means a constitutional majority of those who are actually participating in legislation;" and he refused to make the ruling. Later on, when Mr. Keifer was Speaker, he did not, nor did the rules under which he acted, authorize the counting of a quorum; but you are asked to lay aside these precedents of one hundred years. You are asked by the minority, in what they will submit for your government, to adopt a system of rules which gives it into the power of the Speaker to determine whether or not you have acted, and to count you for purposes of legislation whether you vote or not. That is one of the questions to be determined.

Another proposition of the minority is that less than a majority of the members composing the House shall constitute a quorum in the Committee of the Whole. We have not seen fit to follow that. We have followed the precedents of all our legislative history in that regard, and have provided that the same majority be required to constitute a Committee of the Whole that constitutes a quorum of the House. We believe that absenteeism should not be encouraged in this House. We believe that the majority of this House, who are sent here to legislate, should legislate before the people are to be bound. Besides, if you constitute a committee of less than a majority, what is the result? When your committee rises, the same members who compose the committee will compose the House, and if there is less than a majority present you can not report back to the House until the majority are present, and you are blocked.

There are defects and will be defects in any system of rules that can be adopted, so far as doing all of the business that is proposed to the House is concerned. The difficulties are inherent in the situation. They are difficulties that no rules can provide against. They arise from the fact that there are four or five times as many measures seeking consideration as there is time in which to consider them. The rules can not remedy this. You might make one man monarch, and he could not put them through in anything like the form of legislative procedure. Now, another difference between the report of the majority and the report of the minority consists in the introduction and reference of bills. I want to give you a history of what was the action last Congress and will be this in the reference and consideration of a bill under the report of the minority, if it is adopted. The method that was adopted and acted upon during the last Congress was this: An important bill is drafted affecting the interests of sixty millions of people. It is drafted privately; it is brought into the House privately; it is handed to the Clerk privately; he takes it privately, and in the privacy of his chamber it is referred to a committee. The Speaker is supposed to do this, but as a matter of fact he could not do it in the great majority of cases, and had to intrust it to a clerk.

But if he does do it, it will be referred privately under that method of procedure. It is considered in the committee room privately; it is brought back to the House privately; it is privately placed upon the Calendar, and up to that good hour there would never be a time when you would have voice in determining where it should be referred, what Committee of the House should consider it, nor what Calendar it should go upon after it is reported back to the House. And yet, when it reaches that stage, it will have ostensibly passed two readings; whereas actually there is not a man on the face of the earth, except the one who drafted it, and the members of the committee possibly, that knows anything about the nature of the bill. That is the way important matters were disposed of in the last Congress. That is the way they would be disposed of in this Congress if the report of the minority should prevail. They were passed with only one reading. This is wrong, and we decline to recommend it to the House.

The gentleman from Mississippi, my colleague on the Committee on Rules [Mr. CATCHINGS], has also amplified on the rule which gives the privilege of reporting at any time to the Committee on Rules.

The gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED], if I understand him aright, says that under the rules we propose "a majority can not rule, but the Committee on Rules can." That is a suppression of the important consideration that every report from the Committee on Rules has to be brought back to this House; has to receive a majority vote of this House, and must have its affirmative action before it ever binds the House. How can it be said that the House is not ruling itself when that is the course? One thing more; if there happens to be a member in the cloakroom who does not participate, he can not be counted as participating under the rules which we propose.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have stated to you that we have declined to follow the action of the last Congress by constituting one hundred members as a Committee of the Whole; and we have also taken from the Speaker of the House the right to count a quorum in the absence of affirmative action of the members themselves. I am asked by a gentleman near me if he ever had the right. The rules pretended to give it; but it was exercised before the rules gave the right. We always denied the right, and do yet. I do not care what prevailed in the last Congress; I do not care what may be the sense of the Supreme Court of the United States as a matter of expediency or right. The time should never come when any majority should saddle any law on the people of the United States by less than the action of a quorum of this House.

Mr. Speaker, as an answer to the speech of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED], and the best answer to his action when Speaker of this House, I want to call attention to a speech he made in the Forty-sixth Congress on the rights of the minority to resist and to interpose dilatory motions. The following is an extract:

> Now, what is the practical upshot of the present practice? It is that the members of the minority of this House upon great occasions demand that every bill which is passed shall receive the absolute vote of a majority of the members elected. They do this in the face and eyes of the country. If they demand upon any frivolous occasion that there shall be such an extraordinary vote as that, they do it subject to the censure of the people of this land. This practice has hitherto kept this House in proper condition upon this subject, so that there has been no improper impeding of the public business.
> It is a valuable privilege for the country that the minority shall have the right by this extraordinary mode of proceeding to call the attention of the country to measures which a party in a moment of madness and of party feeling is endeavoring to enforce upon the citizens of this land. And it works equally well with regard to all parties, for all parties have their times when they need to be checked, so that they may receive the opinions of the people who are their constituents and who are interested in the results of their legislation.

Sir, the time was when he and his colleagues were in the minority. The time was when their rights were supposed to be sacred. Then he repeated it as the voice of the American people, and then proclaimed in his own terse, strong way—in a way that has never been surpassed by any one—the rights of the minority. For one I believe in those rights. I believe in their sacredness. I would not take them away from the minority that is here today. I would never have them taken away by anybody that comes hereafter. The time can never come when deliberation is not of the first importance in the preservation of our institutions.

The distinguished gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] referred to a matter that I probably ought to note for one moment—that is, that we have left out of the rules the provision dedicating a Friday night session for the consideration of reports from the Committees on Pensions and Invalid Pensions. He knows well—he can not help knowing—that there never was a provision of the rules of that kind until the last Congress; but that that right has always been given under a special order of the House, and will be now. No one seeks to deny that right; on the other hand, we all stand ready to guarantee it.

Now, the next portion of the report that has been criticised by gentlemen, and especially by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY], is that provision which authorizes legislation on appropriation bills. I beg gentlemen who criticise this provision to remember that this report giving authority to amend the law on appropriation bills is an enlargement of the powers of the committees making appropriations and of the House, and not a restriction upon them. It is an enlargement in the direction of economy in public expenses. And if there ever was a time when every safeguard should be thrown around the Treasury, when every bulwark against extravagance should be put up, when every Representative should constitute himself a watchman on the tower over the Treasury, it is this day. What is the sad spectacle we have witnessed under the form of rules adopted in the last Congress? I do not propose to go generally into a discussion of that legislation, and I do so even generally only to show the legitimate fruits of a system by which the voice of the Representatives of the people was stifled.

The expenditures of the Government during the last two years, the period of Republican administration, amounted to $1,009,000,000. What do you think of having reached the high-water mark of expenditures, when two-thirds of all the money in actual existence has to go through the hands of the taxgatherer every two years; when 33⅓ per cent of all the money created by the Government of the United States has to be gathered into the Federal Treasury annually? When you count the amount that has been reserved in the banks, the reserves that are kept on hand in the Treasury Department, and all of these various reserves that can not go into circulation, it is safe to say that on the schedule of expenditures of the last Congress one-half of all the money in actual circulation had to be gathered into the Federal Treasury in one year, or the whole of it in two years—I mean that in actual circulation. At such a time, and in such stringency, is it surprising that this House, that was elected for the purpose of emphasizing the dissent of the American people from the action of our predecessors, should try to adopt some means in the direction of wise economy. We have provided what is known as the third section of Rule XXI, that existed for ten years. If I can show the House that through that rule alone one quarter of a billion dollars has been saved to the people of the United States, certainly no man can complain if we adopt that rule again. If I can not do it, I will ask you to ignore it and reject what we have recommended. What were the fruits of legislation under that rule?

Mr. BOATNER. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. MCMILLIN. With much pleasure.

Mr. BOATNER. Was not the very rule to which the gentleman is referring taken out of the rules by a Democratic House?

Mr. MCMILLIN. It was taken out of the rules by a Democratic House for a purpose that did not affect the merits of the question at all. Gentlemen who are present know the history of its being taken out of the rules, and I need not go into that history now.

In my judgment, there never was a time in a Democratic House when the sentiment of the majority of the Democrats of that House condemned that rule.

Mr. HEARD. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. MCMILLIN. Certainly.

Mr. HEARD. What is the gentleman's explanation of the dropping of the rule, if it was not condemned by the sentiment of the House?

Mr. MCMILLIN. It is a long history, and one that I do not propose to enter into now; but gentlemen who were here at the time and saw it done know that it went concomitantly with the taking away of power from the Appropriations Committee. I stood here at the time in opposition to it, and I am proud now that the gentleman [Mr. DINGLEY] who read here yesterday a list of names was unable to read my name among those who favored that action. It was wrong to drop the rule then; it is right to reincorporate it now; and if this House refuses to reincorporate it, it will begin its administration by a colossal blunder. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HEARD. Does not the gentleman believe that that action was taken rather to emphasize the dissent of the Democratic majority from the principle of putting riders on appropriation bills?

Mr. MCMILLIN. It was not, and if it had been, the emphasis did no good, as I will show you. By taking that provision out of the rule the House surrendered its power without correcting any evil, and now, if I can show the gentleman that, will he stand by me?

Mr. HEARD. I am diametrically opposed to the principle of putting riders on appropriation bills.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Then you are the very man I want to convert. [Laughter.] I want to begin at home.

Mr. HEARD. I will listen to the gentleman's arguments, and if they are conclusive to my mind I will be governed by them; but I believe that the legislation which was effected in that way, and which was of a character to commend itself to the House when so presented, would, if it had been presented apart from an appropriation bill, and if it could have had a fair show for consideration here (which the Appropriations Committee could have materially helped to secure for it), would have met approval at the hands of the House without being made a part of an appropriation bill.

Mr. MCMILLIN. You may pass any measure you please here, but you have an adverse Senate and you have an adverse President. Why, sir, two-thirds of the beneficial legislation inaugurated and carried through here of late years has had to come in that way. Let us see if I can make the proof. Our Army was top-heavy, larger than was needed in time of peace, and in 1877 a Democratic House reduced the Army to its present standard by legislation on an appropriation bill and thereby saved millions of dollars.

The compensation to railroads for the transportation of mails was reduced 10 per cent by a provision on an appropriation bill. The compensation of railroads for transporting the mails was at an another time reduced in the same way 5 per cent. The use of the Army at the polls was prohibited by a provision upon an appropriation bill. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Where is the man who will say that that was unpatriotic, unwise, or undesirable? Where is the man who believes that an independent measure for that purpose could have been gotten through, or that such legislation could then have been gotten through here in any other way? We fought the fight and won it; and hence, when the clamor was made in the last Congress to put bayonets behind ballots, the men with the ballots in their hands said to those clamoring: "No; it shall not be done." [Applause on the Democratic side.]

But let me go on in my good work of the conversion of my very much esteemed friend from Missouri.

Mr. HEARD. If the gentleman will permit me, I will say to him now, in order that he may not misunderstand me and that I may not be misunderstood by the House or the country, that I will join him most cordially in taking action for the correction of the evils of which he complains, and am in favor of the most rigid retrenchment. I only object to this method of accomplishing it, by putting "riders" upon appropriation bills and thus putting the legislation into the hands of the Appropriations Committee instead of keeping it in the hands of the House itself.

Mr. MCMILLIN. The gentleman's method or any other method than the one here suggested will be found wholly unavailing. For my own part I am in favor of doing right by any method that is not prohibited by the Constitution of our country or by God Himself. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

But again, there was passed through here, upon the statement that it would take only $20,000,000 from the Treasury, a bill granting arrears of pensions. The legislation has already cost the people of the United States more than $225,000,000. When the people saw how much it was going to cost they raised their hands in astonishment; they stood aghast, and they called upon the Democratic House and upon the Congress of the United States to try to check it, and, as a rider on an appropriation bill, a limitation was made which has saved the people of the United States $220,000,000 of money. And yet we are told that it is wrong to legislate on an appropriation bill.

Mr. ALDERSON. That is, that we can not trust ourselves.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Yes; in other words, as suggested by my distinguished friend from West Virginia [Mr. ALDERSON], the idea is that we can not trust ourselves in acting on our own appropriations.

Again, Mr. Speaker, there came up complaints from all parts of the country that the very juries chosen to administer justice in the Federal courts were being packed, and evidence was adduced to show that that was true, and a Democratic House, on an appropriation bill, if I remember correctly, enacted that salutory law by which nonpartisan juries in the Federal courts were guarantied. [Applause.]

The Secretary of the Treasury was authorized by a provision on an appropriation bill to apply the surplus moneys existing in the Treasury to the payment of the public debt, which could not have been done without that authorization; and under the reductions that were made by the Democratic House on appropriation bills just precedent to the Presidential election of 1876 (which was carried in great measure by means of that legislation) the expenditures of the Government were reduced between twenty-nine and thirty millions of dollars.

So I might go on almost illimitably; and I say now that, in view of these facts, no patriotic man can assert that good has not come from putting on appropriation bills "riders" tending to reduce public expenditures.

But, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman has stated that it is a wrong practice. When we changed our rules did we, I ask him, change the practice? Not at all. And I was astonished to see my friend from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] strain so strenuously at his gnat when he had taken down his camel without complaint in the last Congress. [Laughter.] What was done in the last Congress? Go here south of the Capitol and observe that magnificent stone pile—residence—which formerly belonged to Gen. Benjamin F. Butler, the eagle-eyed orator of Massachusetts. That building was purchased at the last Congress by means of a "rider" on an appropriation bill. That "rider" was put on in this House. The property adjacent to it was also purchased, and for these two pieces of property the prices paid were $275,000 for the Butler building and $150,000 for the Richards property, making $425,000 paid for those two properties by means of a "rider" on an appropriation bill, when there is not on the American continent any man who would give $300,000 for them for any purpose in the world.

What more? Coming to the Senate, what is the history of that body on this subject? As soon as they got us to leave off from appropriation bills legislation reducing expenses that body went into the business of increasing expenses by changing the law on appropriations. Why, sir, they bought this hotel over here north of the Capitol—the Maltby. The Senate actually bought a hotel for $135,000 by a "rider" on an appropriation bill. And, although this House joined in the purchase, no committee of this body can to-day get a committee room in that building. [Laughter.] That is the history of the matter.

Now, what does a Democratic Congress propose to say? What does this Committee on Rules say? Not that you can go into any "wild-cat" legislation on appropriation bills—not that you can swamp the Treasury of the Government by changes of law on appropriation bills. No, sir. What the rule we propose provides is, that any amendment which is germane to the bill—mark you, germane to the bill—and which retrenches expenditures, shall be in order on a general appropriation bill; in other words, that the House shall have the right to meet the question. Are you for it or against it?

What more? Let us see what the gentlemen who have criticised this provision in so masterly a way did themselves in the last Congress. New offices were created on general appropriation bills. What offices? Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, at a salary of $4,000 a year; Assistant Secretary of War, at a salary of $4,000 a year; Assistant Secretary of the Navy, at a salary of $4,000 a year; Assistant Attorney-General, at a salary of $5,000 a year; Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General, at a salary of $4,000 a year. Then there were increases of salary on the general appropriation bills. The salary of the minister to Mexico was increased from $12,000 to $17,000; that of the Assistant Commissioner of the General Land Office from $3,000 to $3,500. The salary of thirty principal examiners in the Pension Office was increased from $2,400 to $2,500. The salary of the minister to Turkey was increased from $7,000 to $10,000. The salary of the chief clerk in the General Land Office was also increased. And so it goes on through the whole list. For one, sir, I propose to stand by the action of the Committee on Rules and to say by my vote that this report is right. I believe, too, that this House will stand by it. I thank members for their attention. [Applause.]

CONTROVERSY WITH CHILE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will lay before the House a message from the President of the United States.

Mr. BLOUNT. I hope that the papers accompanying the message will also be laid before the House.

The Clerk proceeded to read the message of the President of the United States; which, with the accompanying papers, is as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith additional correspondence between this Government and the Government of Chile, consisting of a note of Mr. Montt, the Chilean minister at this capital, to Mr. Blaine, dated January 23; a reply of Mr. Blaine thereto of date January 27; and a dispatch from Mr. Egan, our minister at Santiago, transmitting the response of Mr. Pereira, the Chilean minister of foreign affairs, to the note of Mr. Blaine of January 21, which was received by me on the 26th instant. The note of Mr. Montt to Mr. Blaine, though dated January 23, was not delivered at the State Department until after 12 o'clock meridan of the 25th, and was not translated and its receipt notified to me until late in the afternoon of that day.

The response of Mr. Pereira to our note of the 21st withdraws, with acceptable expressions of regret, the offensive note of Mr. Matta of the 11th ultimo, and also the request for the recall of Mr. Egan. The treatment of the incident of the assault upon the sailors of the Baltimore is so conciliatory and friendly, that I am of the opinion that there is a good prospect that the differences growing out of that serious affair can now be adjusted upon terms satisfactory to this Government by the usual methods and without special powers from Congress. This turn in the affair is very gratifying to me, as I am sure it will be to the Congress and to our people. The general support of the efforts of the Executive to enforce the just rights of the nation in this matter has given an instructive and useful illustration of the unity and patriotism of our people.

Should it be necessary, I will again communicate with Congress upon the subject.

BENJ. HARRISON.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, January 28, 1892.

Señor Montt to Mr. Blaine.

[Translation.]

LEGATION OF CHILE,
Washington, January 23, 1892.

SIR: I have had the honor to receive your note of yesterday, as an inclosure to which you were pleased to transmit to me the instructions sent to Mr. Egan on the day previous.

In the numerous conferences with which you have been pleased to favor me, I have informed you that, immediately after the occurrence of the events of October 16 at Valparaiso, which my Government most sincerely deplored, the judicial authorities initiated the investigation necessary to throw light upon the facts and to detect and punish the guilty parties.

From the antecedents which the Government of Chile was able to collect at the very outset, it appeared that the disorder of October 16 began by a quarrel among drunken sailors, which assumed considerable proportions, owing to the condition of the locality in which it originated, and that the police performed their duty by reëstablishing tranquillity and placing the persons who seem to have been concerned in the disorder at the disposal of the court.

The Government of Chile has no data authorizing it to think that the quarrel was due to any dislike of the uniform of the United States, or that the police failed to perform their duty.

On the contrary, it is a well-demonstrated fact that sailors get intoxicated when they go ashore after having been on board of their vessel for a long time. This is also quite natural. The intoxication of seamen and the disorders to which it gives rise, although they may assume serious proportions and occasion very lamentable offenses, as was unfortunately the case at Valparaiso on the 16th of October, can not constitute an insult to the nation in whose service are the men who have taken part in the disorder, although they certainly do not justify the offenses committed during the disorder.

The Government of Chile could not, however, form a final opinion concerning the nature of the occurrences in question, or as to whether the police had or had not improperly participated therein, or had failed to perform its duty, until the termination of the judicial investigation which had been initiated without delay, and which was pushed forward as speedily as was compatible with the provisions of the law, with the obligation of collecting all the elements of proof that it was possible to collect in order to throw full light upon the matter, and with the necessity of promptly punishing the perpetrators of the offenses which had been committed, and which had been in part suffered by persons in the service of a friendly nation. It was the desire and the duty of the Government of Chile to discover the truth, in order to make its future proceedings conform thereto, and in order that the United States Government might be satisfied that nothing was neglected in order to do full justice.

You were pleased, with your high sense of rectitude, to remark to me that this proceeding of the Government of Chile was correct, and that, although you desired that the judicial investigation might be brought to a close with as little delay as possible, you understood that it was necessary that the ordinary legal proceedings (which were not as rapid in Chile as in the United States) should be held.

I have taken occasion at sundry times to inform you of what the Chilean authorities were doing to bring the investigation to a close.

In the criminal trial held at Valparaiso, not only have landsmen been heard, but also the seamen of the Baltimore; both have been confronted with each other, the reports of physicians and experts have been called for, the opinion of the surgeon of the cruiser has likewise been invoked, and, in a word, nothing has been neglected that could tend to bring the whole truth to light. The seamen of the Baltimore made their statements with the assistance of an interpreter designated by themselves, who was an officer of the cruiser, so that the oath taken by the witnesses, their confrontation with each other, the reports of the experts concerning the cause and nature of the wounds, and the hearing granted to both Chileans and Americans, so that all might present their complaints and charges and be heard in their own justification, give incontestable authority to the trial held at Valparaiso.

In the course of our conferences we sometimes considered the case in which the Government of the United States and that of Chile should fail to agree when the investigation should be terminated and the two Governments should have formed their final opinion, and we agreed that arbitration was the best means of settling the difficulty, and, advancing further in this conciliatory spirit, we even formally agreed that the differences that might arise should be submitted to arbitration.

This agreement to accept arbitration has been the basis of several of our conferences, especially that of the 18th instant, and no antecedent or fact interfering therewith has come to my knowledge. On the contrary, I took occasion to inform you, on the 1st of January, that my Government authorized me to conclude an agreement looking to arbitration, and my Government subsequently approved the agreement concluded by me with you, of which I also informed you.

As the criminal trial initiated at Valparaiso has not yet come to an end, my Government has not yet been able to reply to the demands made by that of the United States. The various documents and antecedents to which I have called your attention in my foregoing communications were designed to inform the United States Government of the progress of the judicial investigation and of the facts thereby elicited; they do not, however, constitute a reply, which can only be given when the facts are definitely brought to light by the sentence which must be pronounced by the courts.

The testimony which the Government of the United States has caused to be taken in California from the crew of the Baltimore can not take the place of the trial which is being held at Valparaiso, where the offenses were committed. This testimony may be useful for disciplinary or administrative purposes in the United States, but it can not serve as the basis of a judicial sentence, either in Chile or in the United States.

The copy which I have to-day had the honor to send you of the statement made by one of the seamen of the Baltimore at Valparaiso shows that that seaman made no charge against the police. The charges which he makes here, in the absence of the accused parties, in contradiction of his first statement, can have no value, either in law or in your enlightened opinion.

It is to be observed, moreover, that the statement made by this seaman at Valparaiso is attested by the judge, by the signature of the seaman himself, and by that of the interpreter, who was an officer of the Baltimore, who had been appointed for the express purpose of inspiring the deponents with confidence.

You are pleased to state, in your instructions to Mr. Egan, that the undersigned has not communicated to the United States Government the note that was addressed to him by Mr. Matta on the 11th of December last. The first time that the honorable Secretary of State saw fit to call my attention to the aforesaid note of Mr. Matta, I told him that that note contained instructions addressed to me by Mr. Matta, and that as I had not been directed to communicate it officially to the Department of State, there was no reason why the honorable Secretary should take cognizance of it.

I further reminded you that it was a doctrine established by the American Government that documents exchanged between the President and Congress, or between the Department of State and the diplomatic representative of the United States in foreign countries, could not form a subject of discussion for foreign governments.

I also took the liberty to remind you of the case of the illustrious Webster and the representative of Austria in 1850. The Austrian Government complained at that time because it considered the instructions sent to a representative of the United States unjust or disrespectful to Austria, the said instructions having been published with a message of the President, who sent it to the Senate. "This Department," said Mr. Webster, "has on former occasions informed the ministers of foreign powers that a communication from the President to either House of Congress is regarded as a domestic communication, of which ordinarily no foreign state has cognizance, and in more recent cases the great impropriety of making such communications a subject of correspondence and diplomatic discussion has been fully shown."

The circumstance of publicity does not change the character of a communication, in the opinion of Mr. Webster, "because such is the common and usual mode of proceeding" in the communications of the President and the Senate.

It was, therefore, on the nature of the note and on no other reason that I based my abstention from communicating to you the instructions which Mr. Matta had sent me on the 11th of December, and I had the honor so to inform you.

I added, however, that it was far from being the purpose of my Government to act in a manner at all offensive to the President of the United States or to any member of his Cabinet, and that Mr. Matta's note, if rightly interpreted, admitted of no such construction.

I afterwards had the honor to inform you that I had received instructions from my Government to inform that of the United States that, considering the views expressed by Messrs. Buchanan and Webster in 1849 and 1850, that the messages sent by the President to Congress are domestic communications which can not serve as a basis for the interpretation by foreign powers or their representatives, my Government had no objection to striking out of the note of December 11 such words as might be considered disagreeable by the United States Government.

On the 18th instant an official telegram was published, which had been addressed by the commander of the Yorktown to the Secretary of the Navy. It was couched in terms that were offensive to the Government of Chile, and in view of what we had said concerning the note of December 11, I deemed it my duty to call your attention to that telegram. The lofty spirit of justice which characterizes you did not permit you to hesitate to tell me that the wording of the said telegram was improper and objectionnble. This declaration on your part, which was as impartial as it was just, terminated the incident.

Since the early part of the month of October, when I had the honor to be invited to unofficial conferences with the representatives of the Department of State (as the credentials which accredited me as minister of Chile had not yet arrived), it has been repeated to me on various occasions by the United States Government that, if the representative of the United States at Santiago was not a persona grata to the Government of Chile, it was sufficient for the Government of Chile so to state, and that the said representative would be succeeded by another.

It is a rule based upon the nature of diplomatic relations, and designed to make them frank and cordial, that the representative of a nation must be a persona grata to the Government to which he is accredited.

In the conference with which you were pleased to favor me on the 20th instant, I had the honor to state that the representative of the United States at Santiago was not a persona grata to the Government of Chile, which would be very glad to receive another representative from the United States. You were pleased to acknowledge that the Government of Chile had a right to ask that a change should be made. Afterwards, having given you notice, I addressed to you, in writing, the same communication which I had made to you verbally.

I have deemed it my duty to state, in this note, the foregoing facts, which show the friendly and cordial purpose of our conferences, in which you took a most important part.

With sentiments, etc.,

PEDRO MONTT.

Mr. Blaine to Montt.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, January 27, 1892.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge your favor dated the 23d instant, but not received by me until Monday, the 25th. I beg to comment on two or three of its recitals. I think from zeal for your country you have made some mistakes, which I shall proceed to correct.

You are right in saying that I considered the proceedings of the Government of Chile in making the judicial investigation of the unhappy affair at Valparaiso entirely praiseworthy. But you will remember that as early as the 25th November I complained of the length of the judicial proceedings, and from time to time renewed the complaint, saying to you very lately that the court had already been eighty days in session considering a matter which in the United States would have been wholly disposed of in two or three weeks. You replied that the Spanish law was slow in its processes but exact in its conclusions; and with your statements I had to be content, though impatient for a final judgment.

Your offer of arbitration was never unconditional and exact. Had it been I would have insisted on your reducing it to writing; for it would have been my duty to lay it before the President for consideration. But I was unable to report a mere verbal exchange of views between us as an agreement to arbitrate. You did say to me several times that in that distant future, when the Chilean court should render its judgment (if the United States should not be satisfied with it), the two countries could arbitrate the matter. And even then you always maintained that Chile would not voluntarily propose arbitration herself, but would do so when requested by some friendly power to take that course. On one occasion you mentioned Spain as a nation likely to intervene with Chile most effectively. Your mention of arbitration was always as a method to be adopted in the future, if we were not content, as I have said, with the judgment of the court. You remarked that to adopt it before would be discrediting the judgment of the court in advance. You always looked to the future for the proposal and acceptance of arbitration.

You say in your note:

"I took occasion to inform you on the 1st of January that my Government authorized me to conclude an agreement looking to arbitration, and my Government subsequently approved the agreement concluded by me."

And yet you do not pretend that a word was ever written of the agreement which you say we made between us. It is impossible that I ever sought to bind the Government of the United States in that way. It would have been in the highest degree imprudent for me to do so.

In regard to the Matta note, which was a subject of contention between us, you sum it up by the following declaration:

"I added, however, that it was far from being the purpose of my Government to act in a manner at all offensive to the President of the United States, or to any member of his Cabinet, and that Mr. Matta's note, if rightly interpreted, admitted of no such construction.

"I afterwards had the honor to inform you that I had received instructions from my Government to inform that of the United States that, considering the views expressed by Messrs. Buchanan and Webster in 1849 and 1850, that the messages sent by the President to Congress are domestic communications which can not serve as a basis for the interpretation by foreign powers or their representatives, my Government had no objection to striking out of the note of December 11 such words as might be considered disagreeable by the United States Government."

By your own statement you evidently attempted to justify the Matta note. I certainly could not accept your language and never did accept language of that kind as an apology sufficient for the case. The Matta note was highly discourteous to the President and the Secretary of the Navy, imputing to them untruth and insincerity. Such language does not admit of conditional or contingent apology, which you offered. It could be apologized for only by a frank withdrawal. You always contended that it was a communication between officers of your own Government, and that it was not proper for this Government to take any cognizance of it. You quoted the well-known declaration in the Hülsemann case in regard to the message of a President to Congress not being subject to criticism in a foreign country. You did not see the great difference involved by your Government sending the Matta circular to all the legations of Chile and requesting its several ministers to publish it, so that Chile was not only responsible for the discourteous language, but for its publication throughout the civilized world. That you did not comply with Chile's request to publish it here was the strongest proof of your own disapproval of the note.

In regard to Mr. Egan, you complained many times and very bitterly to me. Especially was he deserving of censure, you thought, for not communicating to his Government the brutal murder of some young men who were slain by order of Balmaceda. When on the next day I showed you the dispatch of Mr. Egan, speaking of the incident in severe and proper terms, you acknowledged that you were mistaken. I thought you would be satisfied, but you again spoke disparagingly of Mr. Egan, and I said somewhat impatiently, "Why do you not demand his recall instead of constantly disparaging him?" intending thereby not to favor his recall, but to put a stop to the frequent mention of Mr. Egan's name.

In referring to the question you remarked:

"You were pleased to acknowledge that the Government of Chile had a right to ask that a change should be made."

Undoubtedly she has that right provided she assigns a reason. You are too well skilled in diplomatic uses to be reminded that when a nation is pleased to declare that a minister is persona non grata, she is expected to assign a reason therefor. We have twice had occasion to ask Great Britain to recall her minister, and in each case we gave a reason why the minister had ceased to be useful. It is hardly necessary to observe that conditions which we complied with ourselves would likewise be exacted of Chile.

I have thus frankly endeavored to correct some misapprehensions of yours in order that the record of the State Department of the United States shall be kept exact and in all its proceedings shall be proved consistent.

Accept, sir, the renewed assurances of my highest consideration.

JAMES G. BLAINE.

Mr. Egan to Mr. Blaine.

[Telegram.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Santiago, January 25, 1892. (Received January 26.)

I have to-day received the following reply to my note of 22d instant:

[Translation.]

"SIR: The undersigned has had the honor to receive your excellency's communication dated 22d instant, received in this department the 23d and the duly authenticated copies of the instructions which the honorable Secretary of State, of Washington, has sent to your excellency by cable under dates of the 21st instant and the 23d of October, 1891. In the instructions of the 21st instant the honorable Secretary of State informs your excellency that his excellency Mr. Harrison, after carefully examining all that has been submitted to him by the Government of Chile with respect to the event which occurred in Valparaiso on the evening of the 16th of October, and taking into consideration the testimony of the officers and crew of the vessel, the Baltimore, and of others who witnessed the event, has arrived at the following conclusions:

"First. That with regard to that assault there has been no change whatever made in the character given to it by the first report of the event, to wit, that it was an attack upon the uniform of the Navy of the United States, which had its origin and motive in a feeling of hostility toward that Government and not in any act of the individual sailors belonging to it.

"Second. That the public authorities of Valparaiso evidently did not do their duty in protecting those sailors, and that a part of the police and some Chilean soldiers and sailors rendered themselves guilty of unprovoked assaults on the sailors of the United States before and after the latter were arrested, and that he believes that Riggin was killed by the police or the soldiers; and "Third. That he is consequently compelled to carry the question back to the state in which it was placed by the note of the Hon. Mr. Wharton, dated October 23, and to ask for suitable satisfaction and some adequate reparation for the injury done the Government of the United States. The honorable Secretary of State, Mr. Blaine, regrets that the Government of Chile has not, from the very first, duly appreciated the gravity of the question raised, and that it has attributed to it no other importance than that of an ordinary quarrel between sailors, adding that no government which respects itself can consent to civil or military persons employed in its service being maltreated or killed, in a foreign territory, on account of resentment for acts which it may have committed, or which may be imputed to it, without requiring adequate reparation.

"The honorable Mr. Blaine, in this connection, recalls the fact that the Government of the United States has voluntarily recognized this principle, and has acted accordingly, when any injury has been committed by its people against any one holding an official position of a foreign country, in consequence of acts which had aroused resentment. In such case the United States have never sought words of little weight or ambiguous meaning in order to make reparation, but have condemned such acts in vigorous and energetic terms, and have never refused to give other adequate satisfaction. The honorable Secretary of State, Mr. Blaine, states, moreover, that it is not his intention to discuss the details of the incident of October, but only to set forth the conclusion at which his Government has arrived. The honorable Secretary of State says: 'We have given every kind of opportunity to the Government of Chile to offer explanatory or extenuating circumstances, and we have given due consideration to the fact that the Government of Chile during a great part of the time which has elapsed since the 16th of October has been in a provisional situation.' He then adds that he is directed by his excellency Mr. Harrison to say that he has been compelled to take notice of the instructions sent by Mr. Matta, minister of foreign affairs, to the Chilean minister in Washington, under date of December 11, because, although they were not officially communicated to his Government, they received the greatest possible publicity, and that consequently he demands the immediate withdrawal of the said instructions as to those parts which he considers offensive, and adequate satisfaction, in order that the diplomatic relations between the two nations may not be interrupted.

"Without any intention of opening a discussion as to the facts referred to by the communication which I have extracted, and confining himself to the first part of the instructions of the honorable Secretary of State, the undersigned must state to your excellency the regret with which the Government of Chile sees that his excellency the President of the United States finds reason to continue to regard the incident of October as an attack caused by a hostile feeling toward the uniform of the Navy of the United States. That unfortunate occurrence took place on a sudden, in a district where the sailors of the vessels lying in the bay of Valparaiso are in the habit of assembling, without distinction of nationality.

"From the nature of the incident it would be impossible to prove that there was no doubt as to the special cause which served as its origin or pretext; but the undersigned can assert that that cause was not a hostile feeling toward the uniform of the Navy of the United States, because the people of Chile has always esteemed and respected that uniform ever since the time when they saw it figuring honorably in the ranks of the soldiers and sailors who, in a glorious struggle, gave it independence and established the Republic. The undersigned admits that the occurrence of October 16 was of greater gravity than those which usually occur in the same district between the sailors who frequent it, and the fact of knowing that two deaths have resulted from it among the sixteen wounded men of the Baltimore has sufficed to give it an extraordinary character, and to induce the Government of Chile to hasten to adopt the measures necessary to discover and punish the guilty parties, to offer in due time, if there should be ground for so doing, such reparation as might be due.

"The preliminary examination was commenced on the morning which followed the night of the conflict, some days before you presented your complaint, but the investigation could not be finished with the rapidity that the Government of Chile desired, because the rules of procedure in criminal matters which are established by our laws are of slow application, and it was not possible for the President of the Republic to modify or set them aside. This delay, which was inevitable, owing to the independence with which the judicial authorities must act, has compelled the Government of the undersigned to delay, greatly to its regret, the settlement of the difficulty pending with your Government, and a spontaneous offer of reparation for the injury done to the sailors of the Baltimore, and that might be attributed to Chilean soldiers or sailors, or that might affect the responsibility of Chile.

"In view of your communication, and considering that up to date it has been impossible for the trial initiated by the judge of the criminal court of Valparaiso to be decided, the undersigned regards it as his duty to declare once more that the Government of Chile laments the occurrence of October 16, and by way of showing the sincerity of his feeling and the confidence which he has in the justice of his cause he declares his willingness not to await the decision of the examining judge, and proposes to the United States Government that the case be submitted to the consideration of the Supreme Court of Justice at Washington, to the end that that high tribunal, with its learning and impartiality, may determine, without appeal, whether there is any ground for reparation and in what shape it should be made.

"The undersigned would remind you, referring to the conduct of the Valparaiso authorities, that it appears from the preliminary examination that they sent without delay to the scene of the conflict all the forces at their disposal belonging to the special guard of the intendencia and to the police. Swanson, Cass, Nichols, Downey, Honnor, Cunningham, Williams, Talbot, Hollard, Hodge, Butler, etc., seamen belonging to the crew of the Baltimore, stated to the interpreter of that vessel that the object of the police in arresting them was to shelter them from any attempt at attack by the excited people. The undersigned thinks that the action of the police in this matter should be considered with due allowance for the civil war which had recently been brought to a close. The body was not yet properly organized, nor did it have the force that was required to put down a disorder of such proportions in a short time.

"In this connection it is proper to recall the words used by the honorable Secretary of State at Washington in his note addressed to the Marquis Imperiali, and bearing date of May 21, 1891: 'There is no Government, however civilized it may be, however great may be the vigilance displayed by its police, however severe its criminal code may be and however speedy and inflexible may be its administration of justice, that can guarantee its own citizens against violence growing out of individual malice or a sudden popular tumult.' This was precisely the situation of the administrative authorities at Valparaiso on the occasion of the occurence which took place in October.

"The undersigned hopes that the foregoing will convince the honorable Secretary of State that the Government of Chile attaches due importance to the question now under discussion; that he does not for a moment hesitate to condemn, in vigorous terms, the act committed on the 16th of October, or to offer such reparation as is just, and that he has not neglected the opportunity to express these sentiments before now, since on various occasions, and through the plenipotentiaries of both countries, he has forwarded explicit declarations on the subject to Washington.

"The undersigned takes the liberty to recall the fact that, five days after he had taken charge of the department of foreign relations, he addressed to the minister of Chile in the United States a telegram which, in the part relating to this matter, says: 'Express to the United States Government what has already been stated, adding all the data that are known, in the most correct and amicable form; express to the United States Government very sincere regret on account of this unfortunate incident, which although and (not) strange in the ports of the world, this Government doubly laments, owing to its sincere desire to cultivate friendship with the United States.'

"If the United States Government should not accept the foregoing explanations as satisfactory, notwithstanding that the judicial authorities hold the guilty parties responsible for the disorder of October 16, the undersigned must recall the circumstance that the Government of Chile, through the medium of its minister in Washington, has expressed the desire to submit any misunderstanding (dispute) to decision by arbitration by any power or tribunal which may be indicated to it; and, in fact, arbitration was suggested in conference with the minister of Chile in Washington on the 30th of December, when the Government of the undersigned declared its good will and its resolve to accept arbitration after the final judgment, which would not be further delayed many days, in furtherance of its purpose to give a speedy solution to the incident in the most friendly terms.

"The Government of the undersigned called upon its minister for a definite reply on the 11th instant, and on the 13th Minister Montt reported that, notwithstanding certain observations made by the American State Department with respect to the opportuneness of resorting to arbitration, he had, nevertheless, agreed with the honorable Mr. Blaine that, if any divergence of views or disaccord should supervene after the verdict of the judge of Valparaiso, such controversy would yield to arbitration. The undersigned hastened to declare that he would fully accept such an agreement; for which reason the Government of Chile deems that the case has arisen for submitting to arbitration, in terms as ample as those above indicated, any difference of views which it may have with the Government of the United States concerning the incident of the Baltimore.

"There is therefore submitted to the honorable Secretary of State of the Department of Foreign Relations of Washington the designation of either the Supreme Court of justice of the United States or a tribunal of arbitration to determine the reparation which Chile may have to make for that lamentable occurrence.

"As for the dispatch addressed under date of the 11th of December to the Chilean minister in Washington by the minister of foreign relations of the Provisional Government, the undersigned submits that there could not be on the part of the Government of Chile the purpose to inflict any offense upon the Government of the United States, with which it desires ever to cultivate the most friendly relations. Consequently the undersigned deplores that in that telegram there were employed through an error of judgment the expressions which are offensive in the judgment of your Government.

"Declaring in fulfillment of a high duty of courtesy and sincerity towards a friendly nation that the Government of Chile absolutely withdraws the said expressions, the undersigned trusts that this frank and explicit declaration, which confirms that which had already been made to the honorable Secretary of State in Washington, will carry to the mind of his excellency Mr. Harrison, of his Government, and of the American people the conviction that the Government and the people of Chile, far from entertaining a feeling of hostility, has the lively desire to maintain unalterable the good and cordial relations which, up to the present time, exist between the two countries—a declaration which is made without reservation, in order that it may receive such publicity as your Government may deem suitable.

With regard to the suggestion made touching the change of the personnel of your legation to which the instructions of the honorable Secretary of State refer, it is incumbent upon the undersigned to declare that the Government of Chile will take no positive step without the accord of the Government of the United States, with which it desires to maintain itself in friendly understanding.

"The undersigned brings this already long communication to a close in the assurance that he has therein set forth everything that can fully satisfy your Government. The Government of Chile cherishes the conviction that the relations with the Government of the United States should be sincerely and cordially maintained under the shelter of that mutual respect and that good understanding which are based upon the just and equitable appreciation of the facts, and on the appreciation to be given to the spontaneous declarations made on either side. The undersigned moreover declares that in presenting its explanations his Government finds its inspiration in the words of the instructions which you have quoted, and which assures the Government of Chile that the President is not disposed to exact or ask anything which your Government would not under the same circustamces spontaneously concede.

"With sentiments of distinguished consideration, I am, your obedient servant,

"LUIS PEREIRA."

I await instructions.

EGAN.

When the Clerk had concluded the reading of the message there was general applause.

Mr. BLOUNT. I ask that the documents accompanying the message be also read.

The SPEAKER. They will be read, if there be no objection.

Mr. BLOUNT. Are they not read as a matter of course?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. BLOUNT. I will not controvert the position of the Chair, but I hope there will be no objection to the reading.

There being no objection, the documents accompanying the message were read.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the message and accompanying documents as just read be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

The motion was agreed to. [General applause.]

THE RULES.

The SPEAKER. The House resumes the consideration of the report of the Committee on Rules. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, it is very strange how often in this House it is necessary to recur to the principles upon which our Government is founded. One would suppose that it would be ever present in the minds of members of the House of Representatives that they represent the people of the United States, and that, subject to our Constitution, the majority is entitled to control the deliberations of that assembly which more nearly and especially than any other represents the people of the United States. Nevertheless, it seems always to be the idea of some gentleman that the fundamental notion of our Government is a wrong one and that there is nothing so dangerous to be trusted as a majority. I suppose that people get more or less biased by positions which they have been in for a long time; that those who have been in the habit of maintaining negative attitudes are quite likely to try to keep them up even when they ought to take a positive attitude, because the people of the United States have so ordered. The Democracy to-day is in control of the House of Representatives. I do not believe that it would be dangerous under the verdict of the people to trust even such a majority as that; and it is perfectly evident to this House that in saying this I am putting the case of the rights and control of the majority as strongly as it is possible to put it.

I have such confidence in the people of the United States, and in their action upon their Representatives even after they are elected and sent here, that I believe in the rule of a majority even when it has been chosen against the views which I myself entertain. If some other gentlemen could rise to the height of our institutions, I have no doubt we would have but little difficulty in regard to the settlement of the question that the majority of this House shall control. For control will rest somewhere, and if you do not rest it in the many you will rest it in the few. If you do not give it to the majority, you will give it to the minority. And I take this occasion to clear up the natural confusion which exists in the mind of a gentleman who spoke yesterday and who represents the new party, and has therefore very much to learn on these subjects [laughter]; that minorities in the House are not always political minorities; that, in fact, the larger part of the business of this House is conducted upon nonpartisan lines, and that if you were simply limiting the partisan majority perhaps a feeling of patriotism might induce some of us to assist you in the business. [Laughter.]

But you are doing more than that. You are limiting the nonpartisan majority of the House and in nonpartisan matters. You are proclaiming not only contempt for your political majority, which perhaps I could endure [laughter], but you are proclaiming a contempt for a large majority of nonpolitical matters which I deem to be, as I deem the other, contrary to the Constitution of the United States and contrary to the principles of democratic or republican government. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Why am I desirous that the majority should rule? It is because it will give to the people of the United States whenever they go to an election a sense that an election really means something; that it is a decision; that it is a determination on their part, not a whim to be corrected afterwards by the House of Representatives manacling itself.

What I have said then is an entire answer to what the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] saw fit to say as to riders upon appropriation bills. We are actually proposing to limit this House in all of its appropriations to the amounts which are named by a committee in charge of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], with the privilege of going lower down than he went, but never a cent higher, and we can not even go down unless we couple with it some legislation that has no business upon an appropriation bill. There is the whole question.

Now, if you want to do that, if you want to express that opinion of yourselves, why all I have to say is that you know yourselves better than I do, and I can not help you. [Laughter.] But I shall lament it because of its future evil example in the history of this country and in the history of the House of Representatives. I believe that this body ought to be as free as it can be for purposes of legislation, and I do not exaggerate the amount of freedom that is possible. Let us all agree together, with willing minds, to give the utmost freedom that is possible, and you will have something that is still very far from an ideally free assembly. The vast number of members which compose this body, the great number necessary to constitute a quorum, the tremendous interests of a local character spreading over this vast country will necessarily and of themselves, even without the constitutional guardianship of the Senate and of the Executive, prevent rash action or too great an amount of action.

Nevertheless, what we are capable of doing we owe to the country, and the Democratic party owes it as well as the Republican party, unless it means to stigmatize itself as a party that desires to do nothing, as a party of negation. That is not the attitude you are in the habit of assuming before the people. You tell them of the things you want to do and mean to do, of the regeneration you intend to give to this country, and commence by bringing it down to the level of a few men on your side whose history for years is that of opposition to progress.

Waste of time is one of the unjustifiable things, and yet you propose to waste hours and hours of the time of this House in the mere introduction and reference of bills in open House on the false and injurious supposition that men who are selected as the chiefest among 30,000 voters will be exalted in their little minds by getting up here and saying, "Mr. Speaker, I present the following bill for reference," when every instant of that time could be saved by having the bill referred by the Speaker, in accordance with the rules of the House.

Every minute of time could be saved, and you are going to wear upon the strength of the Speaker himself by forcing him to give opportunities to men to introduce bills for reference by unanimous consent. Only yesterday morning I endeavored to give to this House an object lesson by asking unanimous consent to allow bills to be presented and referred by the Speaker, when half the House was on its feet; and instead of every man of them insisting on acquiring the little dignity that is to be obtained by rising and asking to refer his bill in that manner each was glad to have an opportunity to behave sensibly and put his bill in the box without consuming time. This would have demonstrated what I was saying had not the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN], in the interest of conservatism, objected, so that you might not see how good a system of rules that system in the Fifty-first Congress was.

Then in the Fifty-first Congress we had a morning hour that meant something. You have got here a morning hour which is a death trap. We had a morning hour that the House might enlarge until it passed any bill that was properly before it. You have a morning hour that is limited to sixty minutes, and a man has only to filibuster a bill for sixty minutes on two days, and it goes, I was going to say, to the tomb of the Capulets, but that is not musty enough for the place where that bill will go. [Laughter.] And you deliberately want to do it and are going to do it probably; and yet the Constitution requires every one of you to be, and you must be, 25 years of age. [Laughter.] My friend from Indiana [Mr. BYNUM], I am glad to say, is on a better track than the last time that I had an interview with him. [Laughter.] If he did not express himself with as much vigor yesterday, he did it with more sense [laughter], and I hail him, if not in the advanced rank of reformers, yet as at least having made some progress.

Now, my friends, do not let mere partisan feeling prevent you from doing some of the things you can do. Why, my friend from Indiana proposes to strike out the motion to fix a day, and the motion for a recess, from the list of privileged motions. Well, now, that deprives the new member of the simple method of filibustering, which is adapted to his untutored mind [laughter]; but my friend from Indiana [Mr. BYNUM], in the full vigor of his knowledge, can filibuster any measure out of existence without any trouble, and I will tell the rest of you how. All you have got to do is to start in the morning and demand a roll call, to see if a quorum is here present; not let the Speaker count them: oh, no, that would be dreadful; that would be violative, you know, of the Constitution of the United States; but have a roll call, and then commence and have every man excused, and then appeal from the decision of the Chair; and with three hundred and thirty appeals from the decision of the Chair, if you should happen to have so many men present, I will inquire just what would be left of the day, when it takes half an hour to settle any one appeal?

Why, the definition which my friend from Mississippi [Mr. CATCHINGS] gives of dilatory motions shows that he never has has been in the position which I unfortunately have been in, of being compelled to have actual conflict with men who wanted to stop business. He does not understand that every motion can be made dilatory. We have a practice of an appeal from the decision of the Chair; and unless you give the right to the Chair, where that appeal is intended solely for purposes of delay, to push it out of the way, you have got an endless chain, and nothing can stop filibustering. Why, I often hear men talk with great reverence about the Speaker of the English House of Commons and how little power he has.

Do you know that his decision can not be appealed from; that nobody ever undertakes it, and that it is not tolerated to so much as talk about it. I have been fifteen years in Congress, and I never saw a Speaker's decision overruled, and you will never live to see it, either. I have seen one temporary Speaker in the chair who made a mistake in ruling, and his party sustained him, and as soon as he got over his feeling, like a man he got up and said to the House that the decision was all wrong. That left the House in bad shape, but it left him right. [Laughter.]

But, after all, the question of what can be done can be easily answered. Here is a very short catalogue, made by a neutral hand, of what was done by the last Congress; and I ask some of you gentlemen to say where as much was ever done before:

The McKinley tariff act, revising the entire series of schedules.
The administrative customs act.
The act to establish the World's Fair at Chicago.
The postal subsidy act, to open direct marine communication with Central and South American ports.
The opening and creation of the Territory of Oklahoma.
The act creating a commission for the proposed continental railroad through Mexico, Central and South America.
The act admitting of Idaho and Wyoming as States.
The pension act, extending pensions to dependent soldiers and soldiers' widows.
The act to reduce pension fees from $10 to $2.
The French spoliation act.
The act to establish the regulations for vessels at sea adopted by the International Maritime Conference.
The act to refund the direct taxes collected from loyal States during the war.

The act making a general revision of the land laws.
The general land forfeiture act, securing the return of lands granted to railroads to the public domain open for settlement.
The completion of legislation dividing the Sioux Reservation and opening a part of it to settlement.
The act to reapportion Congressional representation according to the Eleventh Census.
The act to increase the endowment and equipment of State agricultural colleges.
The meat and cattle inspection acts, in the interest of interstate and foreign commerce.
The act against gambling on race courses in the District of Columbia.
Various acts designed to improve the administration of the Post-Office Department and extend postal facilities.
The act increasing the monthly purchase of silver.
The original package act, allowing States having prohibitory laws to enforce them against shipments of liquor from other States.
The international copyright act.
Court of Private Land Claims.
Extension of payment of lands in case of crop failures.
Indian depredation claims.

In addition to that, there was passed by the House—there is a mistake here, but I will read it as it is written—a bill to deprive the Southern Democracy of its liberties [laughter], and the bankruptcy act.

I dare say, Mr. Speaker, you will find, and gentlemen upon the other side will find, many of these acts of which they will make complaint. Possibly I may hear a jeer, that it was better not to have passed acts than to pass these; but that is past history. That is what we did.

At this time you on the other side want to have a chance to do what you can do. You want an opportunity for those great remedial measures that you desire. You want to rescue Kansas from starvation [laughter]; you want to look after the burial of Georgia citizens. [Laughter.] You want to pass an act for the free coinage of silver and enable this country to be eternally prosperous. You want also to strike down the tariff, that hideous creature of monopolies; you want to strike down all trusts; you want to redeem this country, and make this a great, a glorious people, such as you are yourselves. [Great laughter.]

That is what you want to do. [Laughter.] And you do not want deliberately to refuse yourselves an opportunity. [Laughter.] But under these proposed rules you do. There is absolutely but one thoroughfare for the passage of bills—but two. One is through the Committee on Rules and the other is by imposing riders on appropriation bills; and your own wisdom, the wisdom of your party, three to one, has in the Forty-ninth Congress rejected that last with contumely. I do not object to the first. I am willing to see a part of an opportunity to do justice if I can not see more. Perhaps you think that by hiding your head in the sand you may become invisible. [Laughter.] Perhaps you think that by cutting yourselves off from action you can go to the people of the United States, as you have been going again and again, with the declaration that you have not done things because you have been prevented by somebody. But that excuse, thank Heaven, will never again be open to the House of Representatives; and if there is anything that makes me prouder than another of the House of Representatives of the Fifty-first Congress it is that fact. Gentlemen, you are out in the open, and you are responsible, not only for what happens but for what does not happen. [Great applause.]

Mr. CATCHINGS. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN].

Mr. MCMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, I will commence where the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] left off, by saying, that if there is anything that makes me happy and the balance of the country both happy and fortunate, it is that he no longer occupies your chair and that his party is in a hopeless minority. [Applause on the Democratic side.] He has spoken of their action. Yes; they did act. He acted as never predecessor before him acted. His party acted as neither it nor any other party ever before acted. He has told what they did. The country knows how they did it; and it is not amiss that I should state some things they did wherein they had to hold up their hapless hands and cry to us, "help us, Casius, or I sink." One of their many offenses was a want of deliberation.

In their mad haste to inconsiderately dispose of measures, they passed a bill which abolished the State of Texas and put it in the Territory of Oklahoma. [Laughter.]

This had to be undone by unanimous consent. In their rush to create some new offices and to change Federal jurisdiction they went so far, Mr. Speaker, as to pass a bill to reform the judiciary, which took from the Supreme Court of the United States almost every bit of the jurisdiction it had, and left that august tribunal without anything to do but drink champagne and eat stewed terrapin, if any of them had become so inclined. [Laughter.] This, too, we had to correct by unanimous consent. Yes, it acted. It found the average rate of duty 45 per cent, against which the people had clamored; a rate of duty higher than existed for war purposes; a rate of duty that the Tariff Commission said could be and should be reduced 25 per cent. It answered the demands of the people for a reduction of taxation by increasing the taxation to an average of 60 per cent. Yes, it acted; and this robbery by process of law is one of the things boasted of.

Again, not content with this, knowing that the people would complain at these things, knowing that imperialism in the chair or on this floor was not acceptable to the American people, they determined that the American people might curse, cry, or complain, as they preferred, that as for them and theirs they would turn the election of the members of this popular branch of the Government over to the Federal power, to the Federal courts, and make it impossible for the people ever to resist effectively by electing a Congress. They boasted that they were going to put bayonets behind ballots; but their boast was vain.

Byron has truly said that—

> Time at last sets all things even—
> And if we do but watch the hour,
> There never yet was human power
> Which could evade, if unforgiven,
> The patient search and vigil long
> Of him who treasures up a wrong.

The people had been wronged and robbed, the Constitution had been outraged, the precedents of a hundred years had been trampled ruthlessly under foot, and the Treasury emptied. But November came without a force bill, and the people rose in their might! They left but barely enough of the following of the gentleman from Maine to call for tellers in the House. [Applause on the Democratic side.] We are here at the old stand doing business. They are gone, and the place that recently knew them will know them no more forever. [Renewed applause on the Democratic side.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CATCHINGS. Mr. Speaker, a gentleman unfamiliar with the methods by which business is transacted in this House, listening to the discussions here on yesterday by gentlemen on the other side, would have supposed that under the mode of procedure which prevailed in the Fifty-first Congress every measure reported by any committee or advocated by any gentleman received prompt and immediate consideration, and he would also have supposed that the object of the rules now proposed to this House for adoption is to undo that system of transacting business and to so arrange matters that it will be impossible for anything to be done by the House unless it is first recommended by the Committee on Rules.

Now, Mr. Speaker, those of us who served in the Fifty-first Congress and witnessed the daily operation of the rules of that House know it to be a fact that in truth no more business was transacted by that Congress, whether we consider public or private bills, than had been transacted by previous Congresses operating under rules the same, in the main, as those now proposed for adoption by this House. The Fifty-first Congress did not adjourn until the 1st day of October, so that it was in session an unusually long time. At my request the Clerk of this House has prepared for me a statement showing the number of public and private bills which passed the Fifty-first Congress and the number of public and private bills which passed the Fiftieth Congress. I find that there were only forty more public bills passed by the Fifty-first than were passed by the Fiftieth Congress. I find that in the Fiftieth Congress fifty-seven more private bills were passed than were passed in the Fifty-first Congress.

So, Mr. Speaker, we have the extraordinary fact that with all their provisions for rushing business through, and with all the facilities which they claim were extended to individual members to press their particular measures, counting both public and private bills, no more statutes were enacted than in the Fiftieth Congress under the old system of rules. It is proper for me to state that I have excluded from this compilation private pension bills, because, as we all know, those are passed on Friday nights, when no system of rules that could be adopted would avail for their expedition if there was any disposition to obstruct their passage.

Perhaps I ought to explain, for the benefit of new members, what we who have served here for some time all know, that at the Friday night sessions, which are set apart for the consideration of private pension bills, there are hardly ever more than twenty-five or thirty members present, so that no rules that could be enacted would expedite the passage of those bills if anybody chose to object to them.

It is true, Mr. Speaker, that the system which prevailed in the Fifty-first Congress did enable the Speaker of this House, by means of his Committee on Rules, to select and press upon and through the House measures to which at least a large minority of the House were opposed. Gentlemen on the other side would have us believe that the provision in the proposed rules giving the initiative to the Committee on Rules to suggest that debate should close upon a measure is a proposition involving the greatest tyranny and the greatest restriction of the rights of individual members.

It is true, sir, that they had no such provision in terms in the rules of the Fifty-first Congress, but practically their rules operated just as harshly as this rule could possibly be made to operate, no matter what might be the composition of the Committee on Rules. We all know that the Committee on Rules in the last House would bring in a report fixing the time at which a vote should be taken upon a pending measure, and that then, before any gentleman could be recognized, Mr. McKinley, speaking for that committee, would demand the previous question upon the adoption of the report. Instantly by a partisan vote the previous question would be ordered, no debate beyond forty minutes would be allowed, the report would be adopted, and the measure would be put upon its passage at the time named and voted through. I say that the present Committee on Rules, no matter how tyrannous it might desire to be, could never deprive members of liberty of action and debate as effectively as it was done under the rules of the Fifty-first Congress.

But, Mr. Speaker, there is this distinctive difference between the plan proposed by us and the plan upon which the rules of the last House were founded. While they did not provide, in terms, that the Committee on Rules should take the initiative, they did provide that the Speaker should not entertain any dilatory motions, and as that provision was construed by him day after day, we all learned that a dilatory motion was any motion which he did not desire to have put. If a motion looked in anyway toward expediting a measure which he favored, it was not a dilatory motion, but if it tended in anyway to obstruct such measure, then it became "dilatory." Now, sir, the Committee on Rules thought it was best that the Speaker of this House should not be brought into constant collision with members. They thought it proper that any member who should offer a parliamentary motion should have an opportunity to have it presented to the House for a decision. We all saw that personal resentments were aroused under the operation of the rules in the Fifty-first Congress.

It is not a pleasant thing when a gentleman rises on this floor for him to be told by the Speaker, "You are an obstructionist, and I decline to put your motion." But under the heat of partisanship that rule was extended far beyond what anybody ever dreamed it would be when it was adopted. Why, sir, we saw the Speaker of this House time and again refuse to entertain an appeal. That was said to be a dilatory motion. We saw the Speaker of the House refuse to allow the question to be put to the House as to whether a given measure should be considered or not. He ruled that the raising of the question of consideration was a dilatory motion. And so it went, Mr. Speaker.

I am saying nothing now for the purpose of reflecting personally upon the distinguished gentleman who occupied the chair of this House in the last Congress. I am making these statements only for the purpose of showing how the rules of that Congress operated and how they must operate when you vest in any one man such power as that.

But, Mr. Speaker, the ruling out of parliamentary motions on the ground that they were "dilatory" was not sufficient to enable the majority in the last House to accomplish their purposes. It was necessary for them to amend the Constitution in order that they might grasp sufficient power to enable them to put their legislation through. Therefore it was that we had the famous quorum rule forced upon us. I believe, Mr. Speaker, as firmly as I believe anything, that that rule was a direct infringement of the constitutional rights of this House; that when the Constitution declares that on the demand of one-fifth of the members present a vote shall be taken by yeas and nays, it means that the vote of the House as a collective body shall be determined by the yeas and nays and by no other method whatsoever.

There was nothing new, Mr. Speaker, about that proposition to "count a quorum;" it had been repeatedly presented to this House and as often rejected. But when the election of 1890 was over and it turned out that while this House would be Republican and while the President would be a Republican, the Republican majority in this House would be extremely slight and slender, then we saw this question broached; we saw it agitated from time to time through the newspaper press, through magazine articles, and in public speeches. All at once the country was given to understand that no business had ever been transacted here under the system which had always prevailed; that the rights of the people had never received due consideration, and that a revolution in our proceedings here must be worked or this country would go to perdition.

So, Mr. Speaker, the public mind was gradually prepared for the decision which was finally precipitated upon us by the distinguished Speaker of the last House, even before his party colleagues in this House had enacted the proposition into a rule.

Mr. Blaine had said that the enactment of a rule of that sort would lead to scandal and to fraud. I ask the gentlemen who served in the last Congress whether his prediction was not verified. What could have been more scandalous, Mr. Speaker, than to have pages sent into the cloakrooms of this House to find whether certain gentlemen were there in order that they might be counted as present and doing business on the floor?

It is true, Mr. Speaker, that in one sense those cloakrooms constitute a part of the Hall of this House; but they are rooms separate and apart from the Hall, where we sit when doing business, and I undertake to say that the average American citizen would denounce as an absurdity the proposition that a gentleman who has retired to one of these cloakrooms, where he is entirely beyond the vision of the Speaker, can under any construction of the Constitution be assumed to be present here and doing business. Yet, Mr. Speaker, the counting of members under such circumstances as present and participating in business was a matter of daily occurrence.

We saw the further scandal (for it was nothing short of a scandal) that when the yeas and nays were being taken gentlemen were counted as present and doing business here although they had left the House long before their names were reached on the roll call. In fact, as one writer said, a gentleman might have left the Hall after the yeas and nays were ordered, and reached the city of Baltimore before his name was reached on the roll call, and yet he would be counted.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, when the yeas and nays had been ordered, although I might have passed through that door and into the corridor before a single name on the roll was reached, the Speaker would have counted me as present and doing business. A member has not the right to vote on a roll call until his name is called; hence if he leaves the Hall before that time the Speaker can not assert that he was present and not voting.

Why, Mr. Speaker, the country believes to this day—I understand now it is not a fact, but I believed it myself until a few days ago—that the practice under that rule was extended to such a point that if a gentleman had merely left his hat in the cloakroom he was counted as though present and doing business. I say sincerely——

Mr. REED. That is only one of the lies that the country was caused to believe—only one of them.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Mr. Speaker, the country has heard the gentleman's attempt to vindicate himself. He has discussed this question until it is threadbare. He has made speeches and written magazine articles; and the country has passed judgment upon him. Mr. Speaker, I am reminded by the presence of my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. MORSE] that when the rules of that Congress were up for consideration and this "quorum" question was being discussed, that gentleman rose and with passionate fluency or fluent passion, whichever it may have been, said that if this House did not adopt those rules there would not be pontoons enough to bridge gentlemen back into this House.

Well, sir, they adopted their system of rules and the pontoons were called for but denied them. They had to walk the plank, and almost every man of them slipped, and, like McGinty, went to the bottom of the sea.

But, Mr. Speaker, it is idle to discuss the constitutional question here presented with the distinguished ex-Speaker of the House. It has been discussed over and over again. The question has gone beyond the arena of discussion. I believe that if there was one single question which more than another determined the majority at the last election against the Republican party it was the manner in which business was administered under the rules of the last Congress. It was perfectly evident to the country that this change of opinion as to the constitutional authority to enact a rule whereby on a yea and nay vote members present, but not voting, might be counted to make a quorum, was brought about by reflection upon the precarious condition and probable helplessness of the Republican majority.

At the time that the House assembled they had but a trifling majority of three or four. Death or other casualties might have destroyed that majority; and it was very evident to its leaders that no partisan measure could be put through the House unless the majority was increased and these rules adopted.

It is true, sir, that men often alter their views, and that because an opinion has been once entertained it need not necessarily be always entertained. There are often good and solid reasons for a change of opinion, and I will not dispute the claim of my distinguished friend from Maine that he has sincerely reached a conclusion the opposite of that formerly expressed and entertained upon this subject.

But, Mr. Speaker, there are thousands of American citizens who are not as credulous as myself, and I do not doubt that there are throughout the country many thousands of people who will not believe that that change of opinion was superinduced by careful reflection. They will persist in believing that the Republican party was moved to enact its quorum rule by the stress of its environments, and the great necessity upon it to control legislation in the last Congress. While thoughtful men do constantly change their minds upon great questions, from the consideration of new elements which enter into them, they do not ordinarily do so unless some new light has been shed upon such questions. It is not pretended, so far as I ever heard, that new light has been turned upon this question. The discussion of it was exhausted, as I have said, years ago.

Previous debates upon the question had left no room for further argument. In fact, Mr. Speaker, the most lucid and conclusive statement of our view of the question that I have ever heard or that I believe was ever uttered by mortal man came from the lips of the distinguished gentleman from Maine himself, who stated, and stated properly, that what the Constitution of the country called for was the votes of members and not the presence of members on this floor. That is the natural construction of the Constitution and the one which had prevailed always in this body. But, sir, even if the quorum rule can be justified under the Constitution, was it a wise and right thing to enact it?

I have the authority of the distinguished gentleman from Maine himself, when in 1880 this question was up for consideration, for stating that even if the Constitution was against the view then entertained by him and now entertained by us and such a rule was admissible, it ought not to be adopted. He said that the practice at times indulged in by minorities of refraining from voting when their names were called had worked well for the people of this country in the past, that it was a valuable privilege for them that a minority should have the right to thus delay business here and attract the attention of the country to proposed enactments, and by that means to delay and sometimes defeat harmful measures. He stated that it was a practice from which both parties had equally suffered in times past, that both parties had felt it, but that, as a whole, the result was great good to the American people.

In stating that, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Maine was not giving an opinion, but stating a fact. He can not hide that fact; he can not obliterate or recall it, although he may have amended his opinion as to the legality of the quorum rule. The value of his statement upon this aspect of the question remains, unless something has intervened since that has tended to make a practice improper at this time which was unquestionably regarded by him as entirely proper at that time. But it should be remembered that this method of filibustering has never been resorted to from that day to this until it was practiced by gentlemen on that side of the House to prevent in the Fiftieth Congress the consideration of the California contested-election case.

But we are told that if members can abstain from voting upon a yea-and-nay call without being counted to make a quorum, we will have only minority rule.

No such result follows. The friends of a measure, if in the majority, can always come here when it is put upon its passage and vote it through.

If it is a fact that minorities control unless we put them in chains and manacles, then, Mr. Speaker, the question may be asked, why is it that every two years both the two great parties go out into the country and struggle to obtain a majority here? If minorities control, why is it desirable that a party shall be in the majority? The fact is that all this talk, Mr. Speaker, about minorities controlling majorities is wholly without foundation and absolutely deceptive.

Now, Mr. Speaker, to get back to these rules. There is no suggestion from any source that the power which is proposed to be vested in this Committee on Rules will be exercised without due regard to the welfare of the House. Representatives may feel assured that no measure which is supported by any considerable number of gentlemen here will fail to receive due consideration at the hands of that committee, or any other committee which might be organized in this House. I claim no special superiority, Mr. Speaker, for the gentleman composing the Committee on Rules. They have no wish or purpose except to do the duty to which they have been assigned, as gentlemen upon every committee in this House are expected to do the duty assigned them. I say that you may intrust this power safely to any five gentlemen on this side of the House or the other, to determine when the rush of business comes, as to which measure shall have precedence over others.

But you have got to lodge this power somewhere. You would have chaos without it. Such power has heretofore been exercised, and usually without opposition, and for the reason, as has been well stated by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED], that nine-tenths of all the business which is transacted here is nonpartisan. But we have found in all preceding Congresses that special orders have necessarily been brought in fixing days for the consideration of special measures, and that without objection. In other words, Mr. Speaker, gentlemen of this House felt that it was necessary that that power should be exercised; and so when the Committee on Rules would come in and propose to set apart this week or such and such days for the consideration of this measure or the other, the proposition was adopted without objection, because gentlemen felt it was necessary to enable them properly to transact business. We simply propose to make the exercise of this power a right, whereas heretofore it was not——

The SPEAKER. The time assigned for general debate has expired. The Clerk will now read the report of the Committee on Rules section by section. As each section is read it is open to amendment and debate under the five-minute rule.

The Clerk proceeded to read the report.

During the reading of the first section

Mr. DICKERSON said: Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the reading be dispensed with until we get to Rule X. I understand there is no question made as to any of the others.

Mr. BURROWS. Oh, no; let it all be read.

The Clerk proceeded with the reading.

Having read as follows:

5. He shall rise to put a question, but may state it sitting; and shall put questions in this form, to wit: "As many as are in favor (as the question may be) say Ay;" and after the affirmative voice is expressed, "As many as are opposed say No;" if he doubts, or a division is called for, the House shall divide; those in the affirmative of the question shall first rise from their seats, and then those in the negative; if he still doubts, or a count is required by at least one-fifth of a quorum, he shall name one from each side of the question to tell the members in the affirmative and negative; which being reported, he shall rise and state the decision;

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I caused to be printed in the RECORD as one of the amendments I would suggest to the House the following:

After the word "doubt," in line 7 of subsection 5, insert the words:
"Or the accuracy of his count is challenged."

As it is now, the House will notice that tellers are appointed in only two cases: one is where the Speaker himself doubts, the other is where one-fifth of the quorum calls for them. Now, it has occurred to me several times since I have been in Congress that there are occasions when the count of the Speaker might be challenged as to its accuracy, and that some provision ought to be made for that case. The Speaker himself will no doubt recall times when he greatly doubted whether the accuracy of the count was sufficient to make it certain. Especially so when the House is quite full, and when, under our rules, the privilege of the floor is granted to a great number of persons. The Speaker no doubt counts as best he can, but there are times when he himself doubts and when others may doubt as to whether he has counted accurately.

I shall not insist upon the amendment if the Committee on Rules are not willing to accept it; but it has occurred to me that it is a rule which the Speaker of the House himself would like to have put in, and one that every man who serves as Chairman of the Committee of the Whole would like to have, because it will avoid unpleasantness, and will give an opportunity for the prevention of any kind of comment, and will be one of the modes by which the House, without any anger or without any tumult, may remove a cause of disagreement, which sometimes leaves soreness behind.

It is a fact, which all of us recognize, that the Speaker of the House presides probably not more than one-third of the time when there is a division. I take it for granted that there are two divisions in the Committee of the Whole where there is one in the House. Inasmuch as all bills appropriating money receive their first consideration in the House, they form the great body of the subject of the debate, and give rise to the great bulk of the questions upon which votes are taken; and as no yeas and nays are called in the Committee of the Whole, the only mode of having a vote is either by the sound or by a division; so that I suppose it is true that the divisions in the Committee of the Whole are twice as numerous as they are in the House. It is not, therefore, by any means, any criticism upon any past Speaker or any doubt as to any future Speaker, but it is simply a mode of obtaining, in the Committee of the Whole, where there is no yea-and-nay vote, an accurate count when any member upon his own responsibility challenges the accuracy of the count of the presiding officer, and there are times when a single vote decides, when the matter of a quorum hinges upon one vote. In this House, where one hundred and sixty-seven members are required for a quorum, and where gentlemen who are not members of the House, officers and privileged persons, are on the floor in considerable numbers, it is often a question which is difficult of determination.

If the gentleman in charge is not willing to accept the amendment I will not press it, and I will not formally make it; but after six years of service in the House I think it is a matter which could be well made, and more easily made at the beginning of a session than at any other time.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the proposed amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding after the word "doubt," in line 7, the words "or the accuracy of his count is challenged."

Mr. CATCHINGS. Mr. Speaker, I differ with my friend from Kentucky as to the desirability of adopting this amendment. The effect of it would be to abrogate the limitation as to the number required to demand a vote by tellers. As the rule now is, it is required that at least one-fifth of a quorum shall demand a vote by tellers before it is ordered. The effect of the gentleman's proposition would be to authorize any single gentleman to require that a vote shall be taken by tellers on every occasion; and the further effect would be to establish a system under which there would be some gentleman who on almost every occasion when a count by tellers is taken would challenge the count. The result would be that the time of the House would be largely consumed by taking votes by tellers, when, as a matter of fact, no one really questions the correctness of the count of the Speaker. Tellers have been called for frequently, not because the accuracy of the count was questioned, but because it required time, and gave opportunity to go out and drum in voters which perhaps would change the result. The effect of the amendment would be to allow a single man to call for tellers, which would consume time, while it was not intended to call into question the correctness of the Speaker's count.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I call attention to the fact that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] does not offer the amendment; and therefore no amendment is pending.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman from Kentucky has withdrawn the amendment.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. I will not press the amendment, but desire before I withdraw it to state that the argument of the gentleman from Mississippi is based upon the fallacious idea that members of the House will be urged by improper motives. Now, it is a fact, which I think will be borne out, that amid all the excitement of the last House, and amid the many things said, and a good many harsh things, at that time when quorums were counted, there were not more than three occasions on which the accuracy of the count was challenged.

The right was challenged, but I think that in all that time the accuracy of the count was not challenged more than three times, showing that in all the great excitement and great feeling that members did not challenge the Speaker's conduct as to accuracy unless there was some reason for it, and at those times—I know of one occasion when I made the challenge myself—the challenge was accompanied with a statement that it was not meant to challenge the desire of the Speaker to be accurate under the circumstances, but that we challenged the Speaker's count as to certain persons. I think that it has been proved, and it will be proved, that there are times when the Speaker himself would not object to having the count made, but as the Committee on Rules, which consists of the Speaker and two other gentlemen representing the majority, may think it would look ungracious to press such an amendment, I withdraw it.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read:

The Clerk read as follows:

2. He shall make, and cause to be printed and delivered to each member, or mailed to his address, at the commencement of every regular session of Congress, a list of the reports which it is the duty of any officer or Department to make to Congress, referring to the act or resolution and page of the volume of the laws or Journal in which it may be contained, and placing under the name of each officer the list of reports required of him to be made; also, make a weekly statement of the resolutions and bills upon the Speaker's table, accompanied with a brief reference to the orders and proceedings of the House upon each, and the dates of such orders and proceedings, which statement shall be printed.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out in clause 2 all after the word "made," at the top of page 5:

Also make a weekly statement of the resolutions and bills upon the Speaker's table, etc.

I do so for the purpose of inquiring the object of that provision. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Mississippi to Rule XXIV, clause 2, as proposed by the committee, which reads:

After the Journal is read each day, other than Monday, the Speaker shall lay before the House for references messages from the President, reports and communications, etc.

The gentleman will observe, under that rule, after the reading of the Journal each day, the first duty of the Speaker is to clear the Speaker's table by referring everything. Now, why should this rule contain the provision to which I have alluded, that the Clerk shall make "a weekly statement of the resolutions and bills on the Speaker's table?"

That was put in when we had a Speaker's table, and we would go to the Speaker's table to do business. But these rules dispose of the Speaker's table, so far as business is concerned, and direct the Speaker to lay this business before the House immediately after the reading of the Journal. Therefore there are no bills, no messages or bills to be listed. I merely suggest this for the purpose of having it corrected, thinking it to be an oversight.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I think that it had better be allowed to remain as it is.

Mr. BURROWS. For what purpose?

Mr. CATCHINGS. It is very often the case that business is taken up immediately after the Journal is read, under special order, before these communications or Senate bills are laid before the House; and because of that fact it sometimes occurs that very considerable business accumulates on the Speaker's desk. And then my friend also knows, from his long experience here, that it is very often the case that gentlemen ask unanimous consent that measures shall remain on the Speaker's table. It is a way we are sometimes able to get a bill passed.

Mr. BURROWS. I will not press it, if the gentleman thinks it serves any useful purpose.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I say that it is a fact that very considerable business accumulates on the Speaker's table; and it is requisite that we should have a statement of it.

Mr. BURROWS. If the gentleman thinks it will serve any good purpose I have no objection, and will not press an amendment; but I really do not see the object of it.

The Clerk read as follows:

3. He shall note all questions of order, with the decisions thereon, the record of which shall be printed as an appendix to the Journal of each session; and complete, as soon after the close of the session as possible, the printing and distribution to Members and Delegates of the Journal of the House, together with an accurate and complete index; retain in the library at his office, for the use of the members and officers of the House, and not to be withdrawn therefrom, two copies of all the books and printed documents deposited there; send, at the end of each session, a printed copy of the Journal thereof to the executive and to each branch of the Legislature of every State and Territory; preserve for and deliver or mail to each Member and Delegate an extra copy, in good binding, of all documents printed by order of either House of the Congress to which he belonged; attest and affix the seal of the House to all writs, warrants, and subpœnas issued by order of the House, certify to the passage of all bills and joint resolutions, make or approve all contracts, bargains, or agreements relative to furnishing any matter or thing, or for the performance of any labor for the House of Representatives, in pursuance of law or order of the House, keep full and accurate accounts of the disbursements out of the contingent fund of the House, keep the stationery accounts of Members and Delegates, and pay them as provided by law.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment to that section.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend section 3, Rule III, by striking out present provision and inserting following: "Preserve for and deliver or mail to each Member and Delegate an extra copy in good binding of all such documents printed by order of either House of the Congress of which he was a member which he may request in writing to be bound for him."

Mr. CATCHINGS. I think that is a very good amendment; and if my colleague agrees with me, I will accept it.

Mr. RICHARDSON. There is a difficulty to which I will call the attention of the gentleman from Alabama and also the committee, and that is that the statute requires that one copy of each publication shall be sent to members, and this rule only provides a medium by which the statute or through which the statute can be executed. It is made the duty of the Clerk to make the transmissal of each publication, and unless Congress sees fit to repeal the section of the Revised Statutes which authorizes and directs the publication and transmission of one copy of each document to each member it will not be necessary to strike out the rule. The real object of the clause can not be effected unless the statute is amended. I agree that the object is one which is much to be desired, and the bill which we had under discussion the other day, the public printing bill, provided for the very object sought by this amendment. The section of the Revised Statutes should be repealed. I suggest to the gentleman, if he will permit me to do so, that I have drawn an amendment there in anticipation of the passage of the printing bill.

Instead of taking the language of my friend from Alabama, if after the word "belonged" you should add the words "and to which he is entitled under the law," the gentleman's purpose would be accomplished. It will then read this way:

Preserve for and deliver or mail to each Member and Delegate an extra copy in good binding of all documents printed by order of either House of the Congress to which he belonged and to which he is entitled under the law.

If the law remains as it is now, he will have to mail to each member one copy of each document, but I trust the law will be changed at this session. I think the language I suggest will meet the difficulty and will at the same time obviate the necessity for an amendment to the rule if the statute is repealed.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. That might be the case, Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] was right in his statement of the existing law, but I do not understand that we have any such statute as that which he refers to. I do not think there is in the Revised Statutes, or in any of the statutes of the United States, a provision peremptorily requiring that the Clerk shall bind and mail to each member of the House the documents referred to in this rule. If there is such a statute, then it is immaterial whether we have this rule or not, for the statute would of course prevail over the rule. But if we are to have a rule of this sort enacted, let it be such a rule as would meet the assent of our judgment in the absence of a statute; because, I repeat, if the statute exists, the rule is ineffectual anyway.

The purpose of the rule is easily apprehended, and the reform which the amendment would make is a good one. Under the present law or rule as it has existed heretofore, the Clerk of the House is required to bind and send to each member every document printed by order of either House of Congress. The result has been, as I presume every member of former Congresses knows, that the rooms and offices of members have been filled up with matter that is utterly useless, and in fact is a positive incumbrance.

A MEMBER. Why do not they give it away?

Mr. COBB of Alabama. It is not worth giving away. Nobody will have it.

Mr. JOHNSTONE of South Carolina. Why did Congress order the matter printed if it was so worthless?

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Well, Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will tell me why Congress does everything else that it does, I will answer his question. [Laughter.] As was stated by some distinguished gentleman in the last House, Congress is continually ordering matter to be printed which nobody ever reads, and which can not even be given away, because nobody will take it. In fact, you can not do anything with it but throw it in the waste-basket or sell it to the junk-dealer. But whether the Congress acts wisely or unwisely in ordering these documents printed is not the question here. We all know as a matter of fact that many of the documents that come to us are utterly worthless.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. I ask unanimous consent for a minute or two more to complete my remarks.

There was no objection.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. I merely want to remark, in conclusion, that the amendment which I propose will take away from the members of the House no right which they now enjoy. They can still have all these documents if they choose to have them, but if they do not want them they need not ask for them. Such documents as members want to have bound they can have bound under the amendment which I propose and which I hope will be adopted.

Mr. BUSHNELL. Mr. Speaker, I do not know that I exactly understand the force of the amendment proposed, but if I do, it strikes me that there is no object in adopting it. I do not understand that this amendment will prevent the printing and preparing of these documents, but simply that it will put every member to the trouble of making a list of the documents that he desires to have sent to him and filing that list with the clerk. Now, I see no use in putting members to that trouble. I believe the rule as it stands is a better one. We do not need, under the rule as it stands here, to look over the RECORD and find out what documents have been ordered to be printed and then prepare and file with the Clerk a list of those that we want to have sent to us. They come to us without all that trouble. It seems to me that the amendment suggested by the gentleman will simply impose upon every member an additional amount of work which is quite unnecessary. Of course a great many of these public documents will prove to be of no use to members, but among the great amount of chaff there must certainly be found some wheat.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. If the gentleman will permit me, I think he fails to draw the distinction between printing documents and binding them. You can have your documents just as you do under the rule, but the question is whether they shall all be bound at a heavy expense, whether they are of any use or not.

Mr. BUSHNELL. Then this amendment simply refers to binding the documents.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. That is all. If you want your documents bound you can have it done, but if not you need not have it done, and there will be a considerable saving to the Government.

[Mr. HOLMAN withholds his remarks for revision. See Appendix.]

Mr. COBB of Alabama. It applies only to those public documents which have heretofore been bound and furnished to members whether requested by them or not. This practice costs the Government a good deal of money; and the result is that there is accumulated at the homes of members a mass of matter utterly useless to them or anybody else.

Mr. GEISSENHAINER. Then this applies only to the public documents furnished to members?

Mr. COBB of Alabama. That is all.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. COBB, of Alabama, it was not agreed to; there being—ayes 15, noes 38.

The Clerk proceeded to read the provisions of the proposed rules in regard to the duties of the Clerk of the House.

Mr. ENLOE. I desire to offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of Rule III add the following:

"He shall pay to the officers and employés of the House on the last day of each month the amounts of their salaries that shall be due them; and when the last day of the month falls on Sunday he shall pay them on the day next preceding."

Mr. ENLOE. Mr. Speaker, there is no provision in our rules directing the Clerk to make payment of their salaries to the employés of the House; but it has been the custom for him to make such payment on the last day of each month. In the different Departments of the Government and in the Senate, when the month ends on Sunday the custom has been to make the payments on the preceding day. I desire to incorporate such a direction in these rules so that our employés may be as well treated as the employés of the Senate and of the several Departments. Many of the gentlemen connected with the House are dependent on their salary from month to month, and they need to receive it promptly in order to make settlement with their boarding-house keepers and others. By compelling them to await payment until the first day of the month they may be prevented from meeting their obligations as promptly as they desire.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. ENLOE, it was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows under the heading "Duties of other officers;"

He [the Doorkeeper] shall allow no person to enter the room over the Hall of the House during its sittings; and fifteen minutes before the meeting of the House each day shall see that the floor is cleared of all persons except those privileged to remain.

Mr. BYNUM. I move to amend by adding to the clause last read the following:

And kept so until ten minutes after the adjournment.

Mr. CATCHINGS. There is no objection to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

1. Every member shall be present within the Hall of the House during its sittings, unless excused or necessarily prevented; and shall vote on each question put, unless, on motion made before division or the commencement of the roll call and decided without debate, he shall be excused, or unless he has a direct personal or pecuniary interest in the event of such question.

Mr. BERGEN. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to clause 1, Rule VIII, the following:

"Provided, That the Speaker shall not, under this rule, have the power to declare any member in contempt or imprison him as in contempt for a disregard of the rule on his part."

Mr. BERGEN. Mr. Speaker, the rule of the last House on this subject has been so altered in this proposed code as to insert the words "unless, on motion made before division or the commencement of the roll call and decided without debate, he shall be excused." The effect of this, as I understand, is practically to incorporate into the rules of this House the rule which is in operation in the senate of New York, and which has become so offensive in the minds of the people of the country. I propose by this amendment that there shall be no misunderstanding on this question in this House, and that we may be saved from the position into which the people of the State of New York have come because of action which, under a similar rule, has been forced upon them by the lieutenant-governor presiding over the senate of that State. I hope the amendment will receive the approbation of the committee.

The question being taken, the amendment of Mr. BERGEN was rejected.

Mr. BURROWS. I move to amend by striking out in the third, fourth, and fifth lines of the clause last read the words "unless on motion made before division or the commencement of the roll call and decided without debate, he shall be excused, or," thus leaving the clause in such a form as to provide that a member "shall vote on each question put, unless he has a direct personal or pecuniary interest in the event of such question."

I move that amendment because this is a fruitful source of delay. That provision in the rule which allows a motion to be made to excuse a member from voting has been used heretofore to consume public time and arrest the transaction of the public business. In the Fiftieth Congress I have known, under that provision of the rule, a member to rise in his place and ask that another member be excused from voting, a man sitting by his side, without a request from that member or any indication on his part that he desired to be excused, and then that member in turn rising in his place and moving that the first member be excused, and the yeas and nays ordered on both motions.

Mr. OATES. What is the amendment proposed by the gentleman?

Mr. BURROWS. An amendment to Rule VIII, to strike out the words:

Unless, on motion made before division or at the commencement of the roll call and decided without debate, he shall be excused, or.

Mr. OATES. Why not make it on his own motion?

Mr. BURROWS. That would be an improvement; but nevertheless right there is an opportunity to delay the House until a vote is taken by yeas and nays on excusing 332 members. Right in that rule is this fruitful source of delay; and when the question was presented, the point being raised in the Fiftieth Congress, to the Speaker that it was not in order to move to excuse a member unless on the request of the member himself, the Speaker ruled that the motion was admissible.

Mr. BYNUM. I think the gentleman is mistaken in that, and that the final termination of the controversy on that point was that no member could move to excuse another member unless he himself asked to be excused.

Mr. BURROWS. I think the Speaker decided otherwise.

Mr. REED. I think the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN] might give some information on that point.

Mr. BURROWS. I remember it was so held in the beginning; but what was the final outcome of the matter I do not now remember. As suggested, however, by the gentleman from Maine, the gentleman from Tennessee, who himself moved to excuse members, and for whom the motion was also made to be excused, might throw some light on the subject.

Mr. OATES. I remember in the Fiftieth Congress that was done.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DOCKERY in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Michigan.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the "ayes" seemed to have it.

Mr. BURROWS. Let us have a division.

Mr. CULBERSON. Let us have the amendment read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection, pending the division the Clerk will read the rule as it will stand if the amendment be adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

Every member shall be present within the Hall of the House during its sittings, unless excused or necessarily prevented, and shall vote on each question put unless he has a direct personal or pecuniary interest in the event of such question.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 54, noes 68.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

RULE X.

OF COMMITTEES.

1. Unless otherwise specially ordered by the House, the Speaker shall appoint, at the commencement of each Congress, the following standing committees, viz:

On Elections, to consist of fifteen members.
On Ways and Means, to consist of fifteen members.
On Appropriations, to consist of fifteen members.
On Judiciary, to consist of fifteen members.
On Banking and Currency, to consist of fifteen members.
On Coinage, Weights, and Measures, to consist of thirteen members.
On Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to consist of sixteen members.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the last clause of this rule just read be passed over for the present, with leave to recur to it.

The SPEAKER. To what paragraph does the gentleman refer?

Mr. CATCHINGS. To that portion of the rule which fixes the membership of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. The committee have an amendment, and I ask that this be passed over informally, with the privilege of recurring to it hereafter.

Mr. OATES. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. After reading this section fixing the membership of the committees of the House, would it be in order to recur to any part of it for the purpose of amendment?

The SPEAKER. The idea of the Chair was that as each paragraph was read it would be open to amendment, and if none is offered before another paragraph is read it would be too late to go back to it.

Mr. OATES. I will ask in passing over this paragraph that permission be given to recur to it again for the purpose of allowing amendments. I mean the paragraph fixing the membership of the different committees.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will send up his amendment.

Mr. OATES. I desire to offer an amendment hereafter to Rule X. I have not yet prepared it, and for that reason ask permission to offer it hereafter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MILLER. I wish to offer an amendment.

Mr. BUSHNELL. Do I understand that each separate paragraph of the rule is open to amendment as we proceed?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks so.

Mr. BUSHNELL. And not after we have passed over the paragraph?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. BUSHNELL. Then I desire to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. There is an amendment now pending.

Mr. OTIS. Mr. Speaker, I wish to submit a parliamentary inquiry. Would it be in order at this time to offer a substitute for Rule X?

The SPEAKER. Not now. After Rule X is perfected by amendment then it will be in order to offer a substitute for it.

Mr. MILLER. I wish to offer an amendment to follow the word "committees," in the third line of Rule X.

The Clerk read as follows:

Subject to the approval of a majority of the members of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the amendment comes too late.

Mr. MILLER. Then I ask unanimous consent to offer it. There was a misunderstanding as to the time it should be offered.

Mr. DOCKERY. Before consent is given let the amendment be again read.

Mr. PICKLER. I certainly understood the rule to be as stated by the chairman in charge of the report, that the entire rule would be read through, and that then it would be subject to amendment; not that it would be only subject to amendment as each paragraph is read.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not so understand it. Of course, if it is so in the RECORD the Chair will bow to it; but the understanding of the Chair was that as each paragraph of the rule is read it will be open to amendment. Otherwise, if a rule is read through, a dozen separate amendments might be offered to the various paragraphs, and great confusion would result.

Mr. BERGEN. I wish to submit a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. BERGEN. Is the section not amendable after the whole paragraph has been read? We have not yet completed the reading of the first section of the tenth rule.

The SPEAKER. That is very true, but there are many paragraphs in the rule, and the Chair has just stated that in his judgment each paragraph is subject to amendment as reached.

Mr. BERGEN. There is only one paragraph in the rule referring to committees. The Clerk has not read the entire paragraph yet, but has only read a portion of it.

The SPEAKER. Has the gentleman any amendment he desires to offer? Does this ruling interfere with him at all?

Mr. BERGEN. I simply wish to understand what the agreement was.

Mr. MILLER. I offer an amendment, and I ask unanimous consent for its consideration.

Mr. CHIPMAN. Mr. Speaker, what is the amendment? Will the Speaker have it read? We do not know what it is.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suggest that all of this section be read from the beginning to the end—the whole section, and then that it be open to amendment.

Mr. BURROWS. Do you mean the whole rule?

Mr. HOLMAN. No; I mean the whole section. This rule, for instance, is divided into three sections.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] asks unanimous consent that the entire section be first read and then that amendments to any part of it be in order. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McMILLIN. I believe the gentleman's suggestion is correct. It will facilitate consideration and will deprive no one of any rights.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the section and read as follows:

On Rivers and Harbors, to consist of fifteen members.
On the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, to consist of thirteen members.
On Agriculture, to consist of fifteen members.
On Foreign Affairs, to consist of thirteen members.
On Military Affairs, to consist of thirteen members.
On Naval Affairs, to consist of thirteen members.
On the Post-Office and Post-Roads, to consist of fifteen members.
On the Public Lands, to consist of thirteen members.
On Indian Affairs, to consist of thirteen members.
On the Territories, to consist of thirteen members.
On Railways and Canals, to consist of thirteen members.
On Manufactures, to consist of eleven members.
On Mines and Mining, to consist of thirteen members.
On Public Buildings and Grounds, to consist of thirteen members.
On Pacific Railroads, to consist of thirteen members.
On Levees and Improvements of the Mississippi River, to consist of thirteen members.
On Education, to consist of thirteen members.
On Labor, to consist of thirteen members.
On the Militia, to consist of thirteen members.
On Patents, to consist of thirteen members.
On Invalid Pensions, to consist of fifteen members.
On Pensions, to consist of thirteen members.
On Claims, to consist of fifteen members.
On War Claims, to consist of thirteen members.
On Private Land Claims, to consist of thirteen members.
On the District of Columbia, to consist of fifteen members.
On Revision of the Laws, to consist of thirteen members.

On Expenditures in the State Department, to consist of seven members.
On Expenditures in the Treasury Department, to consist of seven members.
On Expenditures in the War Department, to consist of seven members.
On Expenditures in the Navy Department, to consist of seven members.
On Expenditures in the Post-Office Department, to consist of seven members.
On Expenditures in the Interior Department, to consist of seven members.
On Expenditures in the Department of Justice, to consist of seven members.
On Expenditures in the Department of Agriculture, to consist of seven members.
On Expenditures on Public Buildings, to consist of seven members.
On Rules, to consist of five members.
On Accounts, to consist of nine members.
On Mileage, to consist of five members.
Also the following joint standing committees, viz:
On the Library, to consist of three members.
On Printing, to consist of three members.
On Enrolled Bills, to consist of seven members.

Mr. MILLER. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask the Clerk to read the amendment which I offer.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The Clerk read as follows:

By Mr. MILLER: Add to Rule X, section 1, the words:
"Subject to the approval of a majority of the members of the House."

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, that rule in its present form imposes a burden upon the Speaker which I consider altogether beyond his capacity to perform. When this country was limited to thirteen States, when it was concentrated between the Alleghanies and the Atlantic, or perhaps even when it was limited to the territory east of the Mississippi, perhaps this rule was sufficient; but we have grown to such an extent that no man living can do justice to all the people of this country in selecting the committees that shape the legislation of this House. We all know that in this House, as in all legislative bodies, the committees shape the laws that are passed, and that it is almost utterly impossible to secure the passage of any bill unless it is favorably reported by a committee. Consequently the committees of this House should represent every section of our country.

Now, I say that the present rule confers a dangerous power upon one man. I say that the people of the different sections of this country should be represented upon the committees of this House. Are they? I have no doubt but that the present Speaker probably made as disinterested a selection as any man who could have been elected. But the system is wrong. We have outgrown it, and as an evidence of the fact the States west of the Great Lakes, clear to the Pacific Ocean, are only represented by three chairmanships upon these committees. One is from Iowa, on the Committee on Education, and the other two are unimportant committees. Now, I ask is that a fair distribution of the chairmanships of this House in the committees which, from the nature of the case, must shape the legislation of this House? Why should this be continued? Is it not antidemocratic? Does it comply with our understanding of what is right and just to confine these committees to any certain section of the country? I apprehend that it is the disposition of this House to do what is fair and right. We have been sent up here to this national temple of our country, not to legislate for any particular section of the country, not to legislate for any particular party, but to legislate for the whole people.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Mr. Speaker, it is sufficient to say that the committees have already been appointed under an order of this House previously adopted, so that that would seem to settle the proposition.

The amendment offered by Mr. MILLER was disagreed to.

Mr. CAMINETTI. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment to paragraph 1, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to subdivision 1 the following:
"On Public Parks and Reservations, to consist of seven members."

Mr. CAMINETTI. Mr. Speaker, I desire briefly to say that in the last few years there have been organized eight or ten great public parks and reservations in this country, and that no law has been passed providing for their government or for their care or protection. Six or seven of those parks are located in the State of California, and I believe that there are measures now before the Congress of the United States for consideration providing for two or three more. I think it is a matter of great importance that should be considered by a committee appointed by this House. Almost everything of that kind now would go to the Committee on Public Lands or to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. Believing that the matter is of such importance as to require these public reservations to be established, they should be considered by a committee appointed for that purpose; and I trust the amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I would like to ask the gentleman if he seeks to include within his amendment the parks and reservations in the District of Columbia?

Mr. CAMINETTI. I have an amendment, if this is adopted, that excludes the parks and reservations of the District of Columbia from going to that committee.

Mr. McRAE. I ask that the amendment be reported. I did not hear it.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. McRAE. I hope that the amendment will not be adopted. It provides for the creation of another committee at the expense of the jurisdiction of the Committee on Public Lands. I do not think there is any necessity for such committee. The Committee on Public Lands has had control of the reservations and parks heretofore, and I have heard of no good reason why that committee should not retain such jurisdiction. If there is any such reason I should like to know it.

Mr. PICKLER. By the creation of the Committee on Arid Lands jurisdiction over those lands has been taken from the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. McRAE. Yes; by the creation of what is known as the Select Committee on Irrigation and Arid Lands the jurisdiction of the Committee on Public Lands was restricted. So much of its jurisdiction has been thus taken away that there will not be a great deal left if another committee is to be provided for, as is proposed, giving jurisdiction over all reservations and parks. I hope the amendment will not be adopted. [Cries of "Vote!"]

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. ALLEN. I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 17 strike out "thirteen" and insert "seventy-five."

Mr. HEMPHILL. What committee is that?

Mr. ALLEN. The Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The SPEAKER. To what committee does the gentleman's amendment refer?

Mr. ALLEN. To the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I hope I may have the attention of the House. The great strain to which thirteen men have been subjected for the last few days on the Committee on Foreign Affairs has prompted me to offer this amendment to increase their number from thirteen to seventy-five. [Laughter.] We have no right, sir, in my humble judgment, to impose so much responsibility upon thirteen men. [Laughter.]

While the gentlemen composing that committee have borne up bravely in the great crisis through which we have just passed and have seemed fully alive to the gravity of the situation, yet, Mr. Speaker, thirteen, you will remember, is an unlucky number; and I do not want any unlucky thing to happen when we come to deal with foreign affairs. Now, Mr. Speaker, I suppose that in ordinary times of peace I should never have thought of making this proposition; but I have been prompted to do so by the feverish excitement and war feeling to which we have been subjected for the last few days. [Laughter.] I understand that there has been some criticism on the fact that so prominent a figure as I in American politics have not spoken out and declared for war before this. I do not know, sir, but that it would be proper for me to state the reasons why my views upon the question of our relations with Chile have not appeared in public print, and why I have not given voice to my warlike feelings before this. [Laughter.] Sir, something more than thirty years ago I went to war, and after thirty years of reflection and deliberation I have concluded probably I was rather hasty. [Great laughter.]

My experience in that war, sir, has never daunted my courage, but it has made me decidedly more cautious. [Great laughter.] I want to say now that I do not intend to reflect on any of my Confederate brethren who have rushed into this war with a zeal that I think is somewhat precipitous. [Laughter.] There are some of them who seem to feel that their reputation for patriotism and loyalty to this country is a little shattered, and they want to repair it. [Laughter.] But, sir, as for myself, my reputation for patriotic devotion to the Government is so well established by years of public service and my courage in battle has been so well attested on many sanguinary fields that I need not rush into the newspapers and declare war to establish myself. [Renewed laughter.] But I say that this should be a great, conservative committee.

Now, sir, I for one do not mean to intimate that the Foreign Affairs Committee has not been equal to the emergency in the present instance. I am not going to censure them; but I simply mean to say that in times like these through which we have just passed the responsibility is too great to impose on so few men, and they might be hustled into war with as much haste as the President's war message was hustled in here. [Laughter.]

Now, sir, recurring to the correspondence, to which we listened to-day, between our Government and Chile, I will say that I never would have spoken on this subject until there was a satisfactory settlement. I did not wish to embarrass either of the parties.

[Laughter.] But now that the matter seems settled I do wish to suggest that while I am not as familiar with diplomatic correspondence between nations probably as the present Secretary of State, Mr Blaine, nor with the etiquette governing in such cases, I do know, Mr. Speaker, the code of honor that governs gentlemen in affairs of this kind, having lived most of my life under that code and having fought duels, and having conducted much correspondence that resulted in satisfactory settlement. [Great laughter.]

Most of the men that I have killed, sir, I have killed under that code. [Laughter.] And I do not see why the same polite rules should not prevail in the conduct of an affair of honor between nations, and I must say that this affair with Chile has not on our part been conducted in accordance with the code. In Mississippi, when one gentleman institutes a correspondence with another looking to the amicable settlement of a misunderstanding, and brings him down to the point at difference, and finally sends him his ultimatum [laughter], if that man were to rush into print and publish the correspondence before his adversary had had time to answer the ultimatum he would be a persona non grata in that State. [Great laughter.]

[Here the hammer fell; but unanimous consent was given to Mr. ALLEN to proceed.]

Mr. ALLEN. When my time expired, Mr. Speaker, I was saying that among us Mississippi duelists [laughter] it is not the proper thing when you have sent your ultimatum to your adversary to rush into print and give your side of the case to the country before you have heard from the other gentleman in reply to your ultimatum. Just to illustrate how this thing strikes me and strikes other people, I will read a sentence from an interview with a distinguished gentleman who once sat where you now sit, Mr. Speaker—I mean ex-Speaker Keifer. I read from the interview with him published in the morning Post of this city:

Mr. Keifer thinks the sentiment in the Republican party is drifting rapidly toward Harrison.

[Laughter.]

His message on the Chilean imbroglio was issued just in time.

[Great laughter.]

"Just in time" is a good phrase

Now, Mr. Speaker, just suppose he had waited a little while longer, think what might have happened! This drifting of sentiment in the Republican party towards that distinguished gentleman, the President of the United States, might have been stopped if he had not gotten in here with that Chilean message "just in time." [Laughter.]

Why, sir, I remember that not a great while ago it was stated in the public prints that on one occasion when the President was to go to New York a train that was to carry him was due to have left the depot at ten minutes of 12 o'clock at night, but it had to be detained until ten minutes after 12, lest the President should travel on Sunday. This regard for the Sabbath was highly commendable, yet I am informed that that same President had a number of printers working hard all day last Sunday in order to get that message in here "just in time." [Renewed laughter.]

I see also by the papers, Mr. Speaker, that the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs was interviewed by another member of that committee, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CHIPMAN]. Mr. CHIPMAN said to the chairman, "You must be glad that the committee is relieved from the great weight of responsibility," and the chairman seemed greatly relieved that the strain was over. Now, that shows how this committee was impressed with its responsibility; and I repeat that it is not right to fix so much responsibility upon a few men. [Laughter.]

But just think of how much of this strain on the committee might have been avoided; how much feverish patriotism might have been reserved to conquer some other nation if the President had only allowed those poor printers to have gone to church on Sunday and have taken time to hear the response to his ultimatum. It is true this would not have gotten his war message in "just in time" to have started the Republican party to drifting his way. But I saw another thing in the papers that distressed me somewhat. Patriotically inclined as I am, anxious as I am to uphold the honor and dignity of our country and the American flag, and often as I have been willing to shed the blood of all my constituents who oppose my election in defense of that flag, I confess I felt a little bad when I read this further from the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs:

But I have no idea that they are going to force it further. No one can read that entire correspondence, gentlemen, without feeling the utmost sympathy at the almost humiliating attitude of the Chilean Government.

Now, Mr. Speaker, why should we proceed with haste to bring the Government of Chile into a state of humiliation; a young republic, our sister Republic, a part of the great "Pan." [Laughter.] For a long time, Mr. Speaker, our distinguished Secretary of State and our friend Mr. Curtis have been sending us documents about the Pan-American affairs and we have been making appropriations for them. Now, here we are humiliating Chile by our hasty action, although she is a part of the "Pan." [Laughter.]

We want Chile to do right, but we do not wish to humiliate her.

Mr. ALLEN. I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, that I have not time to air my war views further; but if the House will give me just one more minute, I wish to reprove a gentleman who has been circulating a story on this side of the House. He seems to think it applicable to some of the hasty proceedings in reference to the war message. He has been telling the story all around the House. He says out in Iowa on a certain occasion while a number of men were engaged in the harvest field the clouds began to gather, and the lightnings began to flash, and finally a few drops of rain began to fall. Now, if you gentlemen do not know from experience, I can tell you that when a man is working for wages out in the hot harvest field there is nothing more delightful to him than a little fall of rain which will drive him in. [Laughter.] So these harvesters broke for the barn. When the great body of them arrived they found that one fellow had got there in advance and was so entirely out of breath that he had fallen prostrate. The foreman asked him: "What in the world made you run yourself to death in that way?"

"Why," he says, "I was afraid the rain would stop before I got in." [Laughter.] Now, if that gentleman intended to insinuate by this illustration that the President rushed himself and the clerks and printers, even to working on Sunday, to get that war message in before Chile had time to apologize, I want to reprove him for it. [Laughter.] This is too grave a question. No one could for a moment suspect that the getting of this message in "just in time" to start the Republican party to drifting toward Harrison was intentional. It was only a coincidence.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. ALLEN, it was rejected.

Mr. WEADOCK. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend Rule X, section 1, by inserting, after the words "on Labor," etc., the words "on Immigration, to consist of nine members."

Mr. Speaker, one question in which the people feel a great concern is this question of immigration; and I submit it to the judgment of this House whether there ought not to be a standing committee having jurisdiction of this subject. Heretofore investigations in reference to this matter have been made, but very little has followed from them. I think that everything relating to this question of immigration—its control and restrictions, if you please—should be submitted to the care of a committee formed for this particular purpose.

Mr. CATCHINGS. There is already in existence in this House a select committee having jurisdiction of all these questions in relation to immigration; such a committee has been appointed, and has power to take full cognizance of this subject. I hope, therefore, the amendment will not be adopted.

The question being taken, the amendment of Mr. WEADOCK was rejected.

Mr. BUSHNELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend Rule X by making the Committee on Rules consist of seven members instead of five, as now provided.

I have no criticism to make upon the rules as reported on the ground that they do not confer upon the Speaker sufficient power. On the contrary, I confess to a feeling somewhat of revolt against the despotic power—unqualifiedly despotic power—that is proposed to be conferred upon the Speaker by these rules, especially when that power is reënforced by this Committee on Rules, whom he is authorized to call to his assistance.

We are all aware, Mr. Speaker, that in theory an absolute despotism is the most perfect government on earth; and it is the most perfect in practice, too, if its theory that the despot can and will do no wrong can be carried out. I am aware, sir, that if the Speaker and the Committee on Rules, whom he calls to his assistance, and who, it appears to me, under these rules, are the absolute dictators of the business that shall be transacted by the House—if these gentlemen are tyrants, they are our tyrants; and we may accept the rule of our own despots more kindly than we would the rule of somebody else.

But, sir, I believe that the Speaker himself and the Committee on Rules would be better satisfied in the discharge of the duties devolved upon them under the rules, if, instead of the power of this committee being placed in the hands of three gentlemen from the southeastern portion of these United States—from the States of Georgia, Tennessee, and Mississippi—that power were reënforced by the addition of a member from the Northwest and another from the Northeast. I believe that if this committee were thus constituted the House would accept its dictatorship, if you please, with better grace, not, perhaps, that the committee would necessarily give us any better government, because I have the fullest confidence in the Speaker of this House and the Democratic members of that Committee on Rules. I believe that if the committee should stand as it now is, its members would do as well as they can under all the circumstances that surround them.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CATCHINGS. Let us have a vote.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. BUSHNELL, there were, on a division—ayes 68, noes 76.

Mr. BUSHNELL. I call for the yeas and nays on this question.

The yeas and nays were not ordered, only 16 voting therefor.

So the amendment of Mr. BUSHNELL was rejected.

Mr. BRYAN. I move to amend so that the Committee on Rules shall consist of nine members instead of five. Mr. Speaker, I wish to occupy only a moment. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BUSHNELL] has forcibly expressed my sentiments on this question. To the Committee on Rules is given, to a large extent, the direction of the business of this House; and I believe it could be done more satisfactorily if the committee were large enough to allow the various portions of the country and the various interests of the country to be represented upon it. That is my only reason for moving this amendment; yet it seems to me a reason sufficient to justify its adoption by the House.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Let us have a vote.

The question was taken; and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MILLER. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have an amendment to offer.

The Clerk read as follows:

Substitute for section 3, of Rule X:
"The standing committees of the House shall be apportioned among the States in proportion to population; and said committees shall elect one of their number as chairman."

Mr. DICKERSON. I make the point of order that that is not up for consideration.

The SPEAKER. That section of the rule has not yet been read.

Mr. MILLER. I sent up the wrong amendment, but will offer another one.

Mr. OTIS. Mr. Speaker, I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add, between "Elections Committee" and "Committee on Ways and Means," the words "On Order of Business, to consist of one member from each State and Territory in the United States."

Mr. OTIS. Mr. Speaker, I simply offer this amendment because we find a large number of gentlemen residing east of the Alleghanies who seem to be entirely ignorant of the fact that a large portion of this Union lies west of the Mississippi River; and I ask that we have a committee on order of business that shall recognize the entire Union.

Mr. DICKERSON. I make the point of order that this amendment is indefinite in its terms. It does not form a new committee.

Mr. OTIS. Oh, yes; it proposes a new committee.

Mr. DICKERSON. It does not mention the fact; it leaves the word "committee" out.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky will observe, by reference to the section, that the word "committee" is used only once in the first line of the section and not afterwards. The Chair thinks the amendment is in order.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 15, noes 74.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MILLER. I now ask for the reading of the amendment I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Substitute for paragraph "On Rules," section 1, Rule X:
"The Committee on Rules, to consist of the chairmen of the standing committees of the House."

Mr. MILLER. It strikes me, Mr. Speaker, that it would be very proper for the chairmen of the various committees of the House to constitute this Committee on Rules, for the reason that they have control of all the business of the House. Each one of the chairmen knows exactly the amount of business before his committee, and, acting in the aggregate, they could provide understandingly for the arrangement of the order of business.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I would like to ask the gentleman a question with his consent. If his amendment is adopted, and we made only chairmen of the committees members of the Committee on Rules, would not that exclude the Republican party and the People's party from representation on that committee?

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, so far as that is concerned, I will say to the gentleman that it is a matter of very little difference to me whether the committee is made up of Republicans, Democrats, or from any other party. My idea is to have that committee composed of men who will act understandingly and in the interest of the transaction of public business; men who will have the information in their hands, so that in bringing the business before the House every section of the country will have equal rights and all important measures equal consideration.

Now, the Committee on Rules have charge of the order of business for the House. It was intimated on yesterday by several gentlemen that of the business presented for consideration in the House probably not more than one-tenth would eventually be perfected. I have always been a Democrat and probably shall always remain a Democrat as long as I retain my life. I am opposed to close corporations of every kind, not only in this House but everywhere else. I do not believe that three men can specify and present the business desired here. I do not think they would be as apt to do justice to all parts of the country as the chairmen of the various committees of the House.

There seems to be a disposition, which I can not understand, in this House to centralize, a doctrine I had always supposed to be contrary to the sentiments and traditions of the Democratic party. But I believe that the people of the country are opposed to anything of the kind, and could not understand why it shall be applied to the business presented here. It will be difficult for them to understand why it is that the order of business shall be limited to the knowledge of three men, when the chairmen of the various committees have all the business before them and are better able to judge of the necessities of the case. They can act intelligently; they know what laws are most necessary for every section of the country; they know the measures that are pending, and can perfect the business more easily and far better than a smaller committee. For that reason I have presented the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend the paragraph which relates to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce by striking out the word "sixteen" and inserting "seventeen."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to consist of seventeen members.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. He shall also appoint all select committees which shall be ordered by the House from time to time.

Mr. BURROWS. I desire to call the attention of my friend from Mississippi to this and ask if there is not an omission. The old rule provided for the appointment of "select committees" and "conference committees."

Mr. CATCHINGS. That was not in the rules of the Fiftieth Congress. It was put in the rules of the Fifty-first Congress. I do not see any special objection.

Mr. BURROWS. Where would be the authority for the Speaker to appoint conference committees?

Mr. CATCHINGS. It has been held always in this House that the Speaker had the power, by virtue of the fact that he was Speaker, and that in some way the House had to name these committees.

Mr. BURROWS. I merely call the attention of the gentleman to the omission.

Mr. MCMILLIN. The authority was exercised always without question until it was incorporated into the rules of the Fifty-first Congress.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of Rule X.

Mr. OTIS. Mr. Speaker, I desire now to offer the substitute that was reported to the House on Monday, offered by myself, which is found on page 525 of the RECORD. It is a substitute for the whole of Rule X. I do not care to have it read, but simply ask for a vote on it.

The substitute offered by Mr. OTIS was disagreed to.

The Clerk began the reading of Rule XI.

Pending which

Mr. LANHAM said: Mr. Speaker, I had intended to offer the amendment which I had occasion to discuss on Tuesday last, to paragraph 51 of Rule XI, now under consideration, and should do so but for the fact that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND], who is chairman of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, has requested me to withdraw the amendment. He assures me that in his judgment there will be opportunity allowed in due time for the consideration of the matter of silver coinage; and knowing his devotion to the subject and relying upon his judgment I have concluded not to press the amendment at this time.

The Clerk read as follows:

3. to appropriation of the revenue for the support of the Government as herein provided, viz: for legislative, executive, and judicial expenses; for sundry civil expenses; for fortifications and coast expenses; for the District of Columbia; for pensions; and for all deficiencies—to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. CATCHINGS. There is a misprint in my copy of the rules which I desire to have corrected. In line 4 of paragraph 3 the words "coast expenses" should read "coast defenses."

The SPEAKER. The correction will be made. The Clerk will make it read "coast defenses."

Mr. HEMPHILL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to move an amendment to the third subdivision of Rule XI, by striking out the words "for the District of Columbia."

I would like to state to the House that the object of this amendment is to take from the Committee on Appropriations the bill which makes appropriations for the expenses of the District of Columbia; and at the proper time I will move a further amendment to the rule, if it is agreeable to the House, to confer upon the committee known as the District of Columbia Committee the right to recommend appropriations for the District expenses.

I do this for the reason that the committee upon the District of Columbia is charged with all legislation connected with this District, and it is practically impossible for the District Committee to control affairs in the District of Columbia in a way which will meet their own judgment and the judgment of this House, unless there is given to them also the power to look into and recommend the appropriations of money for the District. When I first came to Congress, and for many years prior to that time, the Committee on Appropriations had charge of all the appropriation bills that were introduced into the House. This was subsequently changed so that every Department of this Government, the legislation for which went to a particular committee, should look to that committee also to have charge of the recommendation of the appropriation. The Committee on Naval Affairs have charge of the appropriation relating to naval affairs. The appropriations for the Army are given to the Committee on Military Affairs. The appropriations for the Indians are in charge of the Committee on Indian Affairs. That has been the practice of the House for a number of Congresses past, and it is provided in the rules now proposed that it shall be continued.

So far as I know there is no reason why this rule should not be applied to the District of Columbia. I have never been able to understand any reason for this exception, and none has been assigned. When the rule was first changed it was to some extent an experiment, and therefore the House went at it with some degree of caution; but the experience of the House has shown that it is a good thing to put into the hands of the committee which has charge of the legislation relating to any matter the charge also of the bill which shall control the amount of money that Department of the Government is to receive. The rule has been heretofore for the Committee on Appropriations to refer the District of Columbia appropriation bill to a subcommittee consisting of five, and I think it will be conceded that thirteen or fifteen members of this House can as well take care of that appropriation bill as can a subcommittee of five.

Now I do not purpose to go into this to any great extent; but in the last appropriation bill there was an appropriation of $400,000 for work contracted with reference to the improvement of the streets of this city. There was another for the improvement and repair of alleys and sidewalks, and the construction of sewers and sidewalks, of $160,000; and it is impossible, Mr. Speaker, that these things should be so adjusted as to work out the best results when in the hands of different committees.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I rise to suggest that as this is a very important matter, involving five or six millions of dollars, the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HEMPHILL] might well, by unanimous consent, be allowed five minutes more, and I hope that will be granted. This is a subject which the House should thoroughly understand.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HEMPHILL] be allowed five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that I have referred to simply two items in the appropriation bills of the last Congress for the District of Columbia. The question as to the improvement of these streets is a very great one. It involves a large amount of money, and it does seem to me that if we are to have any improvement in the tax affairs of this District; if there is any prospect of bringing the expenses down to a legitimate amount, if they have been excessive, the matter should be put into the hands of a committee which, under the rules and practice of this House, is charged with the consideration of these matters.

It is a fact well known to members of this House who have served in former Congresses that provision was made here for the construction of waterworks for this city; that the Government undertook to make appropriations for that purpose, and divided the expenses equally between the District and the General Government. The officers went to work under this law, and spent between two and three millions of dollars. After a proper examination of the work it was found that the scheme adopted was an absolute and complete failure from beginning to end. I say, Mr. Speaker, that these improvident, unwise expenditures are found, whether done by one committee or another—and I do not propose to reflect upon any committee in the matter. It is only a sample, at least it is only cited to illustrate the importance of the legislation connected with this District, and the importance of putting it in the hands of some single body of men who shall be responsible to the public for it.

As the chairman of that committee in the Fiftieth Congress and in the present Congress, I have often had appeals made to me with reference to the public expenditures which I could not in any way consider, and on which I could make no recommendation, so far as the work of my committee was concerned. A majority of the people believe that the Committee on the District of Columbia has charge of the appropriation bills. Now, it is natural that it will be opposed by the Committee on Appropriations. Members know that we all like to get control of the business of this House. It seems to be a part of our nature, and it is peculiarly a symptom, I may say, of the men who go upon the Committee on Appropriations to think their committee is the one above all others, and that it should have control of everything in connection with this House. I think everyone here who has had any experience will bear me out in the observation that if the Committee on Appropriations (composed as it is today, or composed of any other thirteen members of this House), were left alone to take the business they thought they ought to have, they would take every single bill introduced here for consideration by this body.

Therefore, I want to say to the House, in advance of the remarks of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], who has wonderful absorbent power as chairman of that committee here, that unless some good reason shall be assigned why the Committee on the District of Columbia should not be treated by the same rule that governs other committees, the appropriations for the District should go to the Committee on the District of Columbia. Unless some reason can be assigned why five gentlemen are wiser than thirteen, and why these duties should be divided up between two different committees, neither one of whom feels absolutely responsible for the whole business, I think it would be a wise thing to put this appropriation bill into the hands of one committee, and make them responsible for the legislation and likewise responsible for the expenditures it carries.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I am sure that if the Committee on Appropriations believed that it would be beneficial to the public service that the Committee on District of Columbia should have control of the appropriations for the District, that committee would very gladly assent to the proposition of the gentleman from South Carolina. Speaking for myself, I would consent promptly to the proposition if public interests would be promoted. I do not know of any reason why a committee should seek to increase its responsibilities unless it was clear that the public interest would be benefited. I think my friend from South Carolina [Mr. HEMPHILL] labors under a very serious mistake as to the effect of dividing up the appropriation bills. I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that six years have elapsed since the division of the appropriation bills occurred and were placed under the control of different committees having charge of the legislation for the different departments.

I have a statement before me that I think will astonish my friend from South Carolina as to the effect on the appropriations by thus taking away those bills from the Committee on Appropriations, and it shows the annual increase in the appropriations exclusive of pensions on a per capita basis of population then and now. Since the appropriation bills have been committed to different committees instead of one, the average annual increase has been the enormous sum of $29,115,540.

Mr. BLOUNT. I did not catch fully the statement of the gentleman from Indiana. Was he speaking of all the appropriation bills?

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes.

Mr. BLOUNT. That includes all bills reported by the Committee on Appropriations and others?

Mr. HOLMAN. That takes in all the appropriation bills except pensions. In other words, in the six years—four under Democratic rule, and two under Republican rule, which of course was the most extravagant—there is the enormous increase of $174,693,240. More than one hundred and seventy-four millions of increase, as compared with the corresponding preceding period when all the bills were under the control of a single committee. The reasons for this are very obvious. When all the bills were before a single committee of fifteen members, that committee fully considered the state of the public revenues and how public money ought to be fairly apportioned between the several Departments to carry on this Government.

It was a system of economical adjustment of appropriations for the purpose of carrying on all the great Departments, and the result was a fair measure of economy. No one Department or Bureau was or could be specially considered. The one committee, with all the bills before it, was able to report them to the House adjusted to basis of a given sum to be appropriated for all the Departments.

It is as clear that with the bills distributed there would be no common basis for the appropriations, and in fact no economy, for each Department specially asserts its rights and always demands, as to itself, liberal appropriations.

Since then gentlemen have perceived the result of the change in increased appropriations of over twenty-nine millions annually, an enormous increase, taking the population of those former years as compared with the population during the six years the bills have been divided.

Mr. HEARD. Will the gentleman permit an inquiry?

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. HEARD. Will the gentleman tell us what proportion of that increase of twenty-nine millions has occurred in the bills which are still in the hands of the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. HOLMAN. The proportion of increase on the bills remaining under the charge of the Committee on Appropriations has not been near so great as in the other bills. I have a detailed statement here before me, carefully prepared, which shows that fact. And the reason for it is evident. You can not divide up your appropriations into as many bills as there are separate committees in charge of legislation for Departments without causing a great increase in the activity and pertinacity with which the Departments and Bureaus which are interested in these bills will bring influence to bear upon the several committees; and, assuming the action of members to be governed by the very highest possible degree of integrity, still the great pressure of a Department upon a committee having charge of a single appropriation bill is a thing to be deplored rather than to be desired. The demand for more money is incessant. When the proposition was made in the Forty-ninth Congress to abrogate the rule in regard to what are called "riders" on appropriation bills, legislation in the interest of economy, and to divide up the appropriation bills among several committees, I predicted that in a very short time there would be a marked increase in the public expenditures.

By unanimous consent, Mr. HOLMAN was allowed five minutes more.

Mr. HOLMAN. I say, Mr. Speaker, I predicted that within a short time there would be a marked increase in the public expenditures. I did not think there would be any appreciable increase during the Forty-ninth Congress, but from the very beginning the increase began to be apparent. I then predicted, I think, that within the next few years the increase would reach $100,000,000; but it has gone far beyond that; an increase of one hundred and seventy-four millions in six years ought to arrest attention.

Now, while I should be very glad to see the Committee on the District of Columbia have charge of this bill if the change would improve the public service, I am confident it would not be in the interest of economy, and if the experiment is tried, the result will show it to be a very decided and expensive mistake. At the same time I admit the high character of that committee; I would say the same of any other committee of the House. If you intend to have economy in this Government, gentlemen, you have got sooner or later to place all the great appropriation bills, as in former years, under a single committee. One other word. My friend from South Carolina [Mr. HEMPHILL] is a little mistaken as to the method of considering these appropriation bills by the Committee on Appropriations. The first consideration of a bill is by a committee of five members, but afterwards it is carefully considered by the whole committee of fifteen members.

The subcommittee are now considering the District of Columbia bill. They are already at work upon it. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] is chairman of that subcommittee.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Will the gentleman kindly state under what authority they are at work on the District of Columbia bill?

Mr. HOLMAN. The estimates have gone to the Appropriation Committee in the regular way.

Mr. HEMPHILL. But the House has not charged them with that duty.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Oh, yes, it has.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Why, that is the very question we are considering now.

Mr. CATCHINGS. My friend is mistaken about that. The matter was referred under an order made on the 6th of January.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Has the bill been introduced here?

Mr. CATCHINGS. I do not know about that.

Mr. HOLMAN. No bill is introduced in any case like this. The committee are working on the estimates and preparing the bill.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Exactly; on the estimates, but without authority from this House.

Mr. HOLMAN. The subject is before the committee and in regular order. Not only so, but the subcommittee, with the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] at its head, has been hearing testimony and statements by various persons, and is now engaged in preparing the bill. I do not care to detain the House further, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. DINGLEY. If the gentleman from Indiana will pardon me, I will call his attention to the fact that the Book of Estimates, which covers appropriations for the District of Columbia, has been referred by the House to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. HOLMAN. Oh, certainly; I have stated that. I have already stated that, and also that the District of Columbia appropriation bill is now being considered by a subcommittee.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I submit two tables showing in detail in what manner and by what bills the appropriations have been increased.

The following are the tables:

Regular annual appropriations made by Congress, except for pensions, during the fiscal years 1875–'80, 1881–'86, 1887–'92, inclusive.

a Prior to 1881 there was no distinctive agricultural bill, appropriations for the Agricultural Department being made prior to 1881 on the legislative and other bills.

b The diplomatic and consular act for 1875 appropriated $1,929,819 to pay an award to British subjects under treaty of May 8, 1871. If excluded from the appropriations for the six years 1875–'80, the annual average of that bill would be reduced to $1,223,502 and the per capita to $0.0267.

c Prior to 1881 there was no distinctive District of Columbia bill, appropriations for the District of Columbia being made prior to 1881 on the sundry civil and other bills.

Regular annual appropriations made by Congress during the last eighteen fiscal years, 1875–1892.

	Amounts.	Increase over prior six years.	Average of appropriations per annum.	Average increase of appropriations per annum over prior six years.	Average of annual appropriations per capita of population.
(Average annual population July 1, 1874–1879, 45,783,500.)
Regular annual appropriations made by the Forty-third, Forty-fourth, and Forty-fifth Congresses for the fiscal years 1875, 1876, 1877, 1878, 1879, and 1880, when all the appropriation bills were reported by one committee	$1,026,885,939.87		$171,147,656.64		$3.73

Increase per capita, exclusive of pensions					.01
(Average annual population July 1, 1886–1891, 60,657,375.)
Regular annual appropriations (including $10,000,000 for sugar bounty) made by the Forty-ninth, Fiftieth, and Fifty-first Congresses for the fiscal years 1887, 1888, 1889, 1890, 1891, and 1892, when the appropriation bills were reported by eight different committees	$1,897,985,043.41	$545,700,224.50	$316,330,840.56	$90,950,037.41	$5.21

Increase per capita, exclusive of pensions					.48

Apparent annual increase in appropriations, exclusive of pensions, on per capita basis, after first separation of the appropriation bills began, $5,311,979, or $31,871,874 for the period of six years.

Additional apparent annual increase in appropriations, exclusive of pensions, on per capita basis, after the appropriation bills were committed to eight different committees, $29,115,540, or $174,693,240 for the period of six years.

The average gold value of currency during the years 1875–1880 was 0.9509, which would reduce the average annual amount of appropriations, exclusive of pensions, for those fiscal years to $130,467,307.29 as compared with the average annual appropriations of $211,568,365.28 for the fiscal years 1887–1892, and shows a per capita increase in appropriations for the latter period over the former of 63 cents and $38,214,146.25 per annum, or $229,284,877.50 for the period of six years.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Mr. Speaker, this is a matter of some consequence both to the public at large and to the people of this District. The gentleman from Indiana thinks that his committee is the one that should have charge of the bill making appropriations for the District of Columbia.

Mr. HOLMAN. Oh, no; but I say that one committee should have charge of the appropriation bills.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Well, yours is only one committee. Certainly it is not more than one. The question here, Mr. Speaker, is not as to whether one committee shall have charge of all the appropriation bills, but whether a committee which is charged with legislation connected with a particular subject shall, at the same time when it provides for making an improvement in the law, be able to say that so much money shall be given to carry out that improvement. That is the sole question that is involved here. Now, if it is a fact that $29,000,000 more have been expended annually during the past six years than were expended in a like preceding period, that raises, in the first place, the question whether the expenditure was properly made, for all public money that is expended is not improperly expended.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. I wish to ask the gentleman whether the bill under which he has himself stated that two or three million dollars were lost was not a bill prepared and carried through the House by the Committee on the District of Columbia?

Mr. HEMPHILL. I stated, when I referred to that matter, that I did not know by what committee that bill had been reported, but I cited that case as a demonstration that there was need for some improvement in the management of the affairs of this District.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. But that case meets the point which the gentleman has just made, that where a committee provides for an improvement it should have the power also to provide the money.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I do take that ground.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. And in the gentleman's first speech he furnished us an illustration of how two or three million dollars were lost by legislating in that way.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I stated that I was not on the committee when that bill was reported, and that I did not know by what committee it was reported.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. I do not mean to reflect on the committee; I do not think they have been to blame at all.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I understand that; but I do say that the committee charged with responsibility for the legislation of this District ought at the same time to have control of the expenditures for the District. The gentleman from Indiana, who has been here longer than any other gentleman on this floor and who in all matters connected with finance has as ingenious a mind as any man who was ever in the public service, has not been able to answer this point further than to say that the House has heretofore given certain committees control of the appropriation bills, and the result is that the expenditures have been increased. The proper reply to him would be that if these committees have improperly expended the public money, then the bills of which they have had charge should be taken away from them; but those who are charged with the responsibility of legislating for any particular department of the Government should not be denied control of the necessary appropriations for that department.

The gentleman will not deny that the Appropriations Committee, of which he is the head, has had charge of more bills than any other committee connected with this House. Under this rule, that committee now has, and has had ever since the old rule was changed, six regular appropriation bills under its control. If it be true that $29,000,000 have been annually added to the public expenditures since the change was made, then the committee of which he is chairman is six times as much responsible for this condition of things as any other committee in this House; and thus it is demonstrated beyond all question that the proper thing to do is to take from that committee the power of expending six times as much money as is placed under the control of any other committee on this floor.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will say to my friend from South Carolina that the increase on the bills confided to the Committee on Appropriations has been moderate in comparison with the increase on other bills.

Mr. HEMPHILL. But the gentleman does not produce any figures.

Mr. HEARD. Will not the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] state the figures? Does not fairness to the House require that he should do so?

Mr. HOLMAN. I am not able at this moment to state the exact figures as to the increase of the several bills, as I have not those figures before me in condensed form; but the tables which I have incorporated with my remarks will show the facts on that point. I would greatly prefer that the House should refer all the appropriation bills to the Committee on the District of Columbia, which is a very able committee, rather than have these bills still further distributed, as I am confident that in spite of the most active vigilance on the part of that committee the appropriations for the District would be very largely increased if the proposed division be made.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I had risen for the purpose of moving that the House adjourn; but I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN].

DEATH OF HON. FRANCIS B. SPINOLA.

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Speaker, it is with sincere sorrow that I announce the death of Hon. Francis B. Spinola, a Representative from New York in the Fiftieth and Fifty-first Congresses and also a Representative-elect from that State, and my immediate predecessor. Later in the session I shall ask the House to take appropriate action in regard to his death.

I ask the adoption of the resolutions which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the House has heard with deep regret and profound sorrow of the death of Hon. Francis B. Spinola, late a Representative from the State of New York.

Resolved, That the Clerk be directed to communicate a copy of these resolutions to the Senate.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect the House do now adjourn.

The question being taken, the resolutions submitted by Mr. COCKRAN were unanimously adopted; and in accordance therewith (at 4 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PROPOSED AMENDMENT TO THE RULES.

The following proposed amendment to the report of the Committee on Rules was handed to the Clerk to be printed in the RECORD:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, January 29, 1892.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

TRADE WITH RECIPROCITY COUNTRIES.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting information to the House of Representatives pursuant to resolution of January 13, 1892, and also a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting information to the House of Representatives pursuant to the resolution of January 20, 1892; which were severally referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

MARY T. ANDERSON, DECEASED.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings of the court in the case of James M. Dowling, administrator of Mary T. Anderson, deceased, vs. The United States; which was referred to the Committee on War Claims.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. GROUT, for one week, on account of a death in his family.

To Mr. STEWART of Texas, until Monday next, on account of important business.

To Mr. ATKINSON, for three days, on account of important business.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to Mr. HATCH to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, papers in the case of Joseph T. Scott.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read.

The Clerk proceeded to read the resolution.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Mr. Speaker, I think we had better have the regular order.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I hope the gentleman will allow this to be read for information.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I would be very glad to accommodate the gentleman from New York, but there are many other gentlemen who wish to submit matters of this kind, and if leave is granted to one it must be granted to all.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded, and the House will proceed with the further consideration of the report of the Committee on Rules.

THE RULES.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the pending section.

The Clerk read as follows:

Rule XI, section 3. To appropriation of the revenue for the support of the Government as herein provided, viz: For legislative, executive, and judicial expenses; for sundry civil expenses; for fortifications and coast defenses; for the District of Columbia; for pensions; and for all deficiencies—to the Committee on Appropriations.

The SPEAKER. The pending amendment is that offered by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HEMPHILL] to strike out that part of the paragraph relating to the District of Columbia.

Mr. HEARD. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from South Carolina is not now in his seat, and in view of that fact I hope this will be passed over informally, to be taken up when he returns.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to be heard upon the pending question.

Mr. HEARD. If the gentleman from Georgia is ready to proceed now I will withdraw the request, as I presume the gentleman from South Carolina will be in his seat before the debate has proceeded very far.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, it had not been my intention to say aught in relation to the report of the Committee on Rules now before this House. The speech of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] on yesterday, however, makes it somewhat proper for me to submit at least a partial reply. I wish to say, however, in the outset of my remarks that it is with no purpose of endeavoring to take from the Committee on Appropriations the appropriations for the District of Columbia that I now take the floor. It is for the purpose of preventing any erroneous opinion in this House or in the country in relation to a certain branch of the public expenditures to which reference has been made.

The gentleman from Indiana has seen fit to make a comparative statement of the increase of expenditures in those appropriations made by committees other than the Committee on Appropriations; or, in other words, in those bills outside of those under the immediate control of the Committee on Appropriations and reported from that committee. The gentleman has thought proper to say that among other things there was a large increase in the postal expenditures. I want to say here and now that the increase in the postal expenditures are such as the Committee on Appropriations nor any other committee, with any regard to the public service, could possibly have avoided.

I wish to call the attention of the House to the fact that in 1881 the length of railroad routes in this country was 91,563 miles, and at the end of ten years later, or in 1891, it had increased to the enormous sum of 159,518 miles. I wish to show that the annual transportation on railroads was 103,521,229 miles in 1881, while in 1891 it had increased to 228,719,900 miles, or more than double, within the ten years. I wish to call the attention of the House to the further fact that the cost per annum in 1881 was $11,613,000 for this service, and in 1891, owing to the great increase in mileage, this expenditure reached $25,083,000, or more than double, and under the operation of law.

Is it possible, then, Mr. Speaker, when our mail transportation has more than doubled in ten years, that the gentleman from Indiana will have it go abroad throughout this country that the increased cost is a matter of extravagance, when it but indicates the multiplication of population, the extension of our business in every direction, and the increase of mail facilities exacted by the public demands?

Mr. HOLMAN. My friend will remember that I made no special reference to the Post-Office Department.

Mr. BLOUNT. I wish to say that the gentleman made, as a part of his showing of increased expenditures outside of the Committee on Appropriations, the increase in the postal service.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman will observe that I said nothing about the Post-Office Department whatever.

Mr. HEARD. But the gentleman made no exception in favor of that Department.

Mr. HOLMAN. I published that tabular statement, though.

Mr. BLOUNT. I do not care whether he published the table or not. The gentleman sought to have this House infer that the appropriations had increased enormously outside of the bills reported from the Committee on Appropriations. I want to call the attention of this House to the fact that the increase of appropriations in the postal service grew out of the prosperity of the Republic. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, I trust I may be allowed to proceed for five minutes more.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for five minutes longer. Is there objection to the request?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLOUNT. I want to say to this House further, Mr. Speaker, that so far from this item being a matter of expenditure requiring taxation upon the people, that most of the enormous sum expended for the transportation and the distribution of the mails of the country comes, not out of the public Treasury, but from the sale of stamps, paid by the people who use the mails.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Take, for instance, the receipts of the New York post-office.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will my friend allow me a question?

Mr. BLOUNT. Certainly.

Mr. HOLMAN. That question is this: Conceding all the gentleman has said, could I have presented the statement of the expenditures during the last six years without bringing in that item of postal expenditures?

Mr. BLOUNT. Now, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman, by bringing it in, created the impression that the expenditures of the postal service were unduly increased, and the gentleman must have known logically that this was the charge.

Mr. HOLMAN. I did not say anything about it.

Mr. HEARD. He did not make any exception, though.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, I hardly think it necessary to answer that. This House can not fail to understand that a part of the expenditures, not coming from the Committee on Appropriations, is that connected with the postal service, and that made one of the gentleman's items showing the increase of expenditures outside of the Appropriations Committee. Now, sir, I wish to say, and I say it with pleasure, that in my judgment, under the operation of the present laws, the data of the increase from year to year in the mail service will disclose the fact that the progress of the business of this country will in ten years more make the item of railroad transportation fifty millions instead of twenty-five, without the increase of a single cent of expenditure on the part of the General Government. All this expenditure is regulated by operation of law.

But I have drifted from what I was about to state. This enormous expenditure, from which the gentleman has seen fit to make up his charge of extravagance, is not paid out of the public Treasury. It is practically paid by stamps on letters and newspapers. What is the expenditure? With this enormous mail service you have found that the actual demand upon the Treasury has run from 1881 to 1891 variously from $1,394,000 to $7,000,000, some years more and some years less; so really, as far as this postal service is concerned, it is a matter that might almost be eliminated when you come to consider the question of the burden upon the people in the way of taxation. The people who use these mails are the people who pay the expense.

Mr. STOCKDALE. And nobody complains of it, either.

Mr. BLOUNT. Why, sir, what are we to do about it? If we are to keep down this expenditure we must repeal the laws that allow the mails to be carried. We must suppress the business communication of the people. We must take away the mail facilities that we have been having.

Mr. Speaker, there is very much that could have been said upon the various phases of this subject. But I only rose to speak for a few moments, for the purpose of discrediting the idea that the increase in the postal service of the country and the cost of it came out of the Treasury and would increase the burden of taxation on the people of the country. I want to say, sir, that there have been exhibited in the newspapers of the country these tabular statements, of which I have been complaining, purporting to have come from the Committee on Appropriations and made up by its clerk.

I want now to have the other side of it, and I challenge the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] or others upon this question that is here raised in reference to the mail service.

Mr. FORNEY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BLOUNT. Certainly.

Mr. FORNEY. What went with the deficiencies last year in the revenues of the postal service, and how much of the expense of the postal service was a deficiency?

Mr. BLOUNT. The deficiency last year was $7,000,000.

Mr. FORNEY. Certainly, and where did that come from. Did it not come from the public Treasury?

Mr. BLOUNT. I have already stated that the expenditures for the year were nearly $80,000,000, and the deficiencies of course came out of the public Treasury. The gentleman has asked a question that everybody can answer.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the House very briefly to the pending question. It is that the appropriations for the District of Columbia——

Mr. HEMPHILL. I can not hear the gentleman. I hope he will come over here.

Mr. SAYERS. Come over here. I am more particularly addressing the gentlemen on this side. I can not expect to get your vote.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. I trust we shall have order, and I make the point of order that there is so much confusion that the gentleman can not be heard.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas will suspend for a moment, and the Chair will endeavor to obtain order. The gentleman can not be heard because there is so much confusion on the floor.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, the proposition before the House is to take the appropriations for the support of the District of Columbia from the Committee on Appropriations, where it has always been, and to give jurisdiction over the question to the Committee on the District of Columbia. In the remarks made by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HEMPHILL] yesterday, he indirectly criticised the appropriations that have been recommended by the Committee on Appropriations, which provided for the completion of the work on the aqueduct which was to supply the people of this District with water; it was unfortunate for the gentleman from South Carolina and for his committee, which is seeking this jurisdiction, to refer to that matter at all. If any member of the House will turn to pages 4802–4803, volume 13, part 5, of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, he will find that a bill for that purpose, having passed the Senate and been referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, was reported back to this House by that committee and passed. Now, observe one of the provisions of this bill. It makes appropriations.

Mr. HEARD. That was in the Forty-seventh Congress, was it not?

Mr. SAYERS. That was in the Forty-seventh Congress.

Section 3 of that bill reads as follows:

SEC. 3. That the following sums, or so much thereof as may be necessary, are hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated:

To pay for land to extend aqueduct, $51,370.

For extension of aqueduct to the high ground north of Washington, near Sixth street extended, $599,534.55.

For necessary main connections, $165,400.

To pay for land for reservoir, $35,250.

For work and material in constructing reservoir and gatehouse, $431,273.75.

To pay for water rights and land necessary to extend dam at Great Falls to the Virginia shore, $45,000.

For work and material to complete dam at Great Falls to the level of 148 feet above tide, and extend the same to Virginia shore, $145,151.

To protect the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal from increased flooding by reason of completing the dam at Great Falls, $12,300.

As I have said, that appropriation was made on the recommendation of the Committee for the District of Columbia of the Forty-seventh Congress. The administrative branch of the Government expended the money given by this appropriation, and the consequence was that after having spent every dollar of it, as recommended by the Committee for the District of Columbia, it was found that the work was worthless, and Congress was asked for a deficiency appropriation in order to change the character of the work. Then for the first time was it that the Committee on Appropriations had anything to do with the aqueduct, which had failed so miserably after costing the Government and the District of Columbia so much money.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Will the gentleman yield to me for three questions right there?

Mr. SAYERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Were you a member of the Committee on Appropriations at that time?

Mr. SAYERS. When?

Mr. HEMPHILL. In the Forty-seventh Congress.

Mr. SAYERS. I was not then a member of Congress.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I was not a member, either.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. SAYERS. The gentleman from South Carolina is advocating the very policy which was adopted by the Forty-seventh Congress, and I take it that this House will never consent to follow the Forty-seventh Congress in the matter of appropriations.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. HEMPHILL. The gentleman knows perfectly well that the appropriation bill was not in the hands of this committee in the Forty-seventh Congress, and he knows that I am not advocating any such measure.

Mr. HOLMAN. When?

Mr. HEMPHILL. On that bill.

Mr. SAYERS. I will refer to the bill.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HEMPHILL. The gentleman knows that the bill of which he is speaking was passed in the Forty-seventh Congress, and I was not in the Forty-seventh Congress.

Mr. SAYERS. I know that.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Then why are you stating it to this House?

Mr. SAYERS. I have stated what was done by the Forty-seventh Congress.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired. The Chair will beg of gentlemen when they are notified that their time has expired that they should cease conversation on the floor.

Mr. SAYERS. I beg the pardon of the Speaker. I did not hear the Speaker, as I was being interrupted by the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. HEARD. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Texas be allowed to proceed.

Mr. HEMPHILL. The gentleman permitted me to propound three questions, and then when he found he was in a hole he went on to address the House.

Mr. HEARD. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Texas be extended five minutes, as the same courtesy has been extended to everybody else.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks that the time of the gentleman from Texas be extended five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SAYERS. No, Mr. Speaker, if there is any "hole" in the matter, the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HEMPHILL] has dug it and put himself into it.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Well, I picked you out of it, at any rate.

Mr. SAYERS. I am trying to get into it now after you to help you out. [Laughter.]

Mr. HEMPHILL. You know that the Forty-seventh Congress was presided over by Speaker Keifer.

Mr. SAYERS. Of course.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Well, why do you not state that fact?

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, what I said before and what I say now is that during the Forty-seventh Congress—and, to please the gentleman from South Carolina, if it will do him any good, I will state that the House was then presided over by Speaker Keifer—the Committee for the District of Columbia had control of that particular bill for the District and procured the appropriation of more than $1,000,000. That committee recommended the appropriation to the House. It passed both House and Senate and was signed by the President, and the Department went to work under the act, and having spent all the money, found that the work was a total failure. Congress was appealed to, and the matter referred to the Committee on Appropriations to provide for deficiencies.

Mr. HEARD. How much more money has your committee from time to time added to that $800,000 which was wasted under the original bill?

Mr. SAYERS. None.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Oh, yes; they have given a great deal more than the Committee on the District of Columbia gave.

Mr. SAYERS. The Committee on Appropriations, ascertaining that the work, so far as it had gone, was a failure, did, upon the recommendation of the engineer in charge, supported by the War Department, provide for a change in the character of the work and recommend other appropriations.

Mr. HEARD. How much?

Mr. SAYERS. Some $700,000 or $800,000.

Mr. HEARD. The gentleman stated in the first place that all the money on that work had been wasted, and now——

Mr. SAYERS. Oh, no; I said that all the Committee on the District of Columbia had recommended to be appropriated had been wasted.

Mr. HEARD. What became of the appropriation that your committee recommended? Has not all that money been wasted, too?

Mr. SAYERS. I do not know.

Mr. HEARD. The country does.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, I call for order, and I trust the Chair will ask the gentlemen who are interrupting me to be quiet while I am addressing the House. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair has called for order several times. The Chair has no power to enforce order except by appealing to members, and he trusts that gentlemen will conform to the rule, and when they desire to interrupt the gentleman who is addressing the House they will first address the Chair. Otherwise, the Chair will be compelled to ask the Sergeant-at-Arms to assist in preserving order on the floor, because the public business can not be transacted in this way.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, in conclusion, I desire to submit one single proposition to this side of the House. You have before you, gentlemen, the experience of Congress and of the Government in the matter of one appropriation which was recommended by the Committee for the District of Columbia. They got the Government into that trouble; they involved it in the expenditure of a very large sum of money from which no good has resulted; and now I appeal to you to decide whether, with that experience before you, you will take the appropriation bill for the District of Columbia away from the Appropriations Committee where it has so long belonged and give it to the Committee for the District of Columbia, to repeat the experience which we had of its work in the Forty-seventh Congress.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] very naturally undertakes to hold on to everything that he has got. Like most other people, he holds what he has got and grabs everything he can get his hands on; but after a night's cogitation he has been able to produce only one single instance in which the Committee on the District of Columbia made a mistake.

Mr. SAYERS. That is all I looked for. I had not the time to go entirely through the record.

Mr. HEMPHILL. You had from yesterday until to-day to produce an argument against giving this appropriation bill to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and you have been able to produce but one single instance in which that committee has made a failure in the matter of appropriation.

Mr. SAYERS. I will ask the gentleman whether he himself did not call the attention of the House to this case?

Mr. HEMPHILL. Certainly I did; and I say that if I had not done it you would not have had any argument at all. You know that yourself. [Laughter.]

Mr. SAYERS. Did your committee ever recommend any other appropriations?

Mr. HEMPHILL. Yes, sir.

Mr. SAYERS. Read them to the House, and probably they will be found to be like that one. [Laughter.]

Mr. HEMPHILL. Oh, no.

Mr. HEARD. Will the gentleman from South Carolina allow me to say a word?

Mr. HEMPHILL. Wait a moment until I get through with the gentleman from Texas. Now, Mr. Speaker, it was well known that in the Forty-seventh Congress the Committee on the District of Columbia did recommend an appropriation for certain waterworks in this District. They made that recommendation upon a bill coming from the Senate of the United States, where, as I understand, the matter had been thoroughly sifted, having been previously reported upon by the Engineer Department and the Secretary of War. The gentleman has called attention to the fact that the Committee on the District of Columbia recommended an appropriation of seven or eight hundred thousand dollars, but in honesty he ought to have said that after that work had been inaugurated and had gone far enough to show that it was a complete failure his committee, the Committee on Appropriations, recommended larger appropriations for the continuance of a work which they knew to be a humbug.

And the gentleman can not get out of the position that while this was an unknown experiment, so far as the District of Columbia was concerned, it was an ascertained and determined fact that it was a failure; and yet the committee of which he is a member made an appropriation of a larger sum on account of it. I do not think the gentleman is dealing fairly with the House when he withholds from it the fact that the Committee on Appropriations, of which he was a member, made large appropriations of the public money to this business after it had gone far enough to be determined, on a careful investigation and study of the subject, that it was an utter and a total failure.

Now, Mr. Speaker, when the gentleman from Indiana on yesterday referred to some increases of expenditure by reason, as he says, of the separation of these various appropriation bills, I took occasion to refer to certain increases of appropriations which came from his own committee. I want to show, sir, that the committee of which the gentleman from Indiana is now chairman has six of these appropriation bills in its charge, and according to some figures that I have been able to gather since the adjournment on yesterday, and according to the figures the gentleman himself produced, the increases made by his own committee on these six bills amount, within the time to which he alludes, to between fifteen and sixteen millions of dollars; and hence it comes with very poor grace from a gentleman having charge of a committee which has charge of more appropriation bills on the floor of this House than any other committee, six times as many; and I think it certainly comes with bad grace from him, to come here and complain of increases of expenditures, when his own committee is six times as responsible for the increases as any other committee of the House.

But, Mr. Speaker, this question is not to be determined solely by whether or not the amount of money appropriated by Congress has been increased or decreased in the last eight or ten years. As everybody knows, the country has increased and is increasing largely in population, and additional expenditures are necessary. Nor is the question to be settled by the parsimonious views of some gentlemen who think the whole object of Government is to take money from the people and hold on to it as long as they can.

Mr. HOLMAN. Oh, no; we do not want to take the money from the people, but to allow it to remain in their pockets.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Now, if we want to go into this question of comparison, let us look at some of the measures the gentleman has recommended on appropriation bills for particular disbursements and objects. Why, according to the gentleman's own figures, between 1881 and 1886 the total expenditures—I mean the average expenditures—for the District of Columbia were three and a half millions of dollars, while last year they reached five and a half millions. So that, according to his own statement, there has been a vast increase in the appropriations for this District.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. HEMPHILL. Certainly.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. Does my friend question the correctness of such amount of appropriation?

Mr. HEMPHILL. I am not now undertaking to criticise any item of the appropriation, but I am meeting the argument of the gentleman from Indiana on his own ground. He tells us that these appropriations have grown largely because of their distribution amongst the different committees, and that this bill must not be transferred to the District Committee for the same reason because of probable increase of expenditures. I want to show that, according to his own figures, there have been increases of expenditures from his own committee in regard to District of Columbia appropriations, increases of from $3,500,000 to $5,500,000 during the time they had control of it, when the other committees had control of their own particular bills.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have no criticism to make upon these gentlemen——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent that debate on this amendment be limited to ten minutes. I think it has proceeded now for a reasonable time.

Mr. HEARD. I oppose that, and hope the House will not adopt the suggestion.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Well, let us fix the time at twenty minutes. I am willing to give a reasonable time further.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. I think this is a pretty important matter. At least it seems that there is an effort to make it so, and I would like to have about ten minutes myself.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Very well; what time would you suggest? Let us fix some limit.

Mr. HEARD. I give notice that I want ten minutes.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. I am not in particular charge of the matter, but I think we ought to have about an hour.

Mr. HEARD. I hope the debate will be allowed to proceed without limit for a while yet.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. Quite a large number of gentlemen desire to be heard, and I think an hour would be not too long.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I rise for the purpose of suggesting to my colleague [Mr. CATCHINGS], having charge of the majority report of the Committee on Rules, that he give at least a reasonable time for the discussion of so important a question as this. We are going to discuss the rules here, are we not? If so, let us do it deliberately and calmly, and not hastily. Let us not proceed amid the confusion which has been witnessed during the discussion this morning. Not one word of the debate could be heard in this part of the Hall. I hope on so important a question ample time will be given. It is quite important that the question should be understood before we are called to vote upon it.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. I suggest one hour to the gentleman from Mississippi. I make the suggestion from my own standpoint, thirty minutes to be allowed to those in favor of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from South Carolina, and thirty minutes to those opposed to it.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. I think that is a reasonable time, and hope the suggestion will be adopted.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Then, if that is acceptable to the House, I will consent that we fix the limit at one hour.

Mr. HEARD. I give notice that I want ten minutes of the time.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. Is that agreeable to the House, to fix the time at one hour?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent that debate upon the pending amendment be limited to one hour. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HEMPHILL] control the time for thirty minutes, and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] control the other thirty minutes on behalf of those opposed to the amendment.

Mr. JOHNSTONE of South Carolina. Does that require unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. It does.

Mr. JOHNSTONE of South Carolina. Then I object to it. I do not believe it ought to be in the power of any set of men upon the floor of the House to say who shall take part in the debate.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Objection is made, and the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] is recognized.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that this question can be properly settled by simply considering the capacity or character of the respective committees. Nor can it be properly settled upon the basis of distributing an equal amount of moneyed legislation among the different committees that may be or that are now charged with appropriations. It is a question of policy, and if the policy of distribution be a faulty one, then the result will be unsatisfactory, however capable the committees may be to which the bills are distributed; and I think that from that standpoint we ought to view this question and make our decision.

It has been the policy of this House until the recent past to keep the money bills assembled in the hands of one committee, which could carefully review the entire scope of public expenditures. Indeed, sir, prior to 1865 we confined to the custody of one committee all questions relating to revenue as well as to appropriations, and only within a few years did we divide the appropriations to any extent at least, and then it was not upon the theory of securing economy in appropriations. It was not upon the theory that this was of itself a better system of dealing with the money legislation of the House, but, as gentlemen well know, the controlling reason was altogether outside of that, and related to tariff legislation: and the best hope we entertained was that the policy of distribution would not lead to improvident appropriations.

Now, a little later than that the Senate divided its revenue legislation from its appropriation legislation, but it has never divided its appropriation bills. Leaving out of consideration mere matters of detail, it is quite evident, in the opinion of the gentlemen on the floor who have long been observant of this matter, that the policy of distribution has not contributed to economy, and that is not because each bill does not receive close scrutiny, but because of the defect in the system which I have intimated, that a committee which has charge of but one bill or of but a part of the appropriation of money can not take into consideration the whole theory of the Government's outlay and guard expenditures, as any committee can do that has all of these bills assembled into its keeping.

Now, sir, it is in no spirit of arrogating power to the Committee on Appropriations, to which I belong; for, so far as convenience and comfort are concerned, I would gladly see this power leave the committee, and especially so as I belong to the subcommittee that is charged with the consideration of this particular bill; but I am firmly convinced, after some considerable association with the fiscal features of our legislation, that the policy of distribution is inherently a false policy. I believe that we should, if we make a change, assemble these bills into one committee rather than distribute them further. Indeed, I strongly incline to the opinion that we should go back to the policy that prevailed before 1865, when, because, and solely because, of the ill health of the Hon. Thaddeus Stevens, then a member of the Committee on Ways and Means, we changed the policy which we had maintained during the whole war, of keeping both the revenue and the appropriation bills in the hands of one committee. I incline to the belief that our policy would be better if we assembled all business in regard to the receipts and expenditures of the Government into the hands of one committee and let it formulate bills in harmony as a whole, and then bring them to the House and let them be considered in the Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. HEMPHILL. May I ask the gentleman a question?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Arkansas. If I may add just one word, I will say that we must reverence practical experience and traditions that are of a practical character, and, in addition now to our own varied experience with these policies, we know the responsibility of reporting a symmetrical policy is vested in one body by the English Government, a Government very much in its spirit and genius like our own.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Did not the gentleman himself vote to distribute the bills to the various committees?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Arkansas. Yes, I did.

Mr. HEMPHILL. You were not then a member of the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Arkansas. No; but I stated my reasons.

Mr. HEMPHILL. You did not state that as a reason.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BYNUM. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say on this question that I heartily favored the rule of the Forty-ninth Congress which divided the appropriation bills among the several committees, and I do not believe I would change that vote now if I had the opportunity of doing so. While I say that, Mr. Speaker, I also desire to say that I am unalterably opposed to conferring the jurisdiction of making appropriations for the District of Columbia upon the District of Columbia Committee, and I believe that every member of this House who has had experience in dealing with the affairs of the District will, with all due respect to the membership of the committee on District affairs, unite with me in the judgment that it would be bad policy to do so. The District Committee has charge of all the legislation with reference to the District. They consume one-twelfth of the time of this House, without having jurisdiction of the bill making the appropriations. It is a very important committee, and it is a fact well known that, with all the efforts of that committee, it is unable to withstand the attacks that have been made upon it heretofore by the different rings, interests, and influences that continually surround it. It is a fact——

Mr. HEMPHILL rose.

Mr. BYNUM. I have but five minutes, and can not yield.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I would like the gentleman to explain the statement he has just made.

Mr. BYNUM. It is a fact well known that the District Committee, after it has transacted the legislation that it now has committed to it, has not time to fully consume the terrapin and champagne set before it by the people of this District.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Will the gentleman state what the Appropriations Committee can do under similar circumstances?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana declines to be interrupted.

Mr. BYNUM. Mr. Speaker, the power to report these appropriation bills for the District ought not to be coupled with the power of maturing and proposing legislation for the District. We now have on hand the Rock Creek Park, which is going to cost us an immense sum of money. I believe that measure originated with the District Committee, as well as other improvements of that character. I believe that a restriction ought to be put upon the power of this committee, and that the Appropriations Committee should retain the jurisdiction of the appropriations. To give the District Committee the power to report these appropriations as well as to take charge of the general legislation for the District would be to intrust too great a power to that committee and would lead to disagreeable reflections, if not worse. I say this with all due respect, because I would as willingly trust the present District Committee as any other committee. Did I not believe there ought to be a check on the District Committee, that the power to report the appropriations ought not to go hand in hand with the authority to present bills regulating improvements, I should not oppose this change. Such a system would subject the committee to too great a pressure from local influences, which are ever present and continually in operation. It would be an unsafe thing to do.

Mr. HEARD. Mr. Speaker, like the gentleman from Indiana, I began my legislative experience here by voting in the Forty-ninth Congress for the distribution of these appropriation bills; and I am glad I did so. Like the gentleman from Indiana, I should vote in exactly the same way to-day if the question were now presented; and I intend to follow the same principle by which I was then controlled in the vote I am about to cast on this question. At that time, Mr. Speaker, I based my action upon the belief that the committee which has charge of the legislation upon any particular subject is better calculated to make recommendations to the House about the necessary means for carrying such legislation into effect than any other committee would be. All that any committee can do is to recommend an appropriation, and the House must approve or reject, and I think that the committee most familiar with the subject of legislation to which an appropriation is to be applied will always be the best qualified to make such recommendation.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] referred to the increase of appropriations within the last six years. It is well known, sir, that only during the last six years have these bills been in the hands of these different committees. This arrangement was in operation during the Forty-ninth and Fiftieth Congresses; and now, in order to make a case against the operation of this rule in those two Congresses, the gentleman couples with their record that of the Fifty-first Congress, including in his estimate appropriations from 1886 to 1892. He lugs into the calculation the appropriation necessary to pay the sugar bounty, and all the other extravagant appropriations of the Fifty-first Congress. I say, Mr. Speaker, that such a presentation of the case is calculated to suggest an unfair inference: that to the separation of these bills and the putting of them into the hands of different committees is attributable the whole of this increase of expenditure. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] has answered that point most effectually, so far as concerns the increase of expenditures in connection with the recommendations of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads; and I have no doubt that the implied charge of extravagance as applied to the work of the other committees having charge of their own appropriation bills can be just as thoroughly refuted.

Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Indiana had stated his proposition in the form of a syllogism it would be like this: The bills were separated; there has been an increase of expenditure; therefore the separation is the cause of the increase. Would it not have been fairer, in view of the facts of history, to have stated the matter thus: The bills were separated; but there has been, in the period which has since elapsed, increased growth, increased prosperity, increased business in the country, and to this fact is attributable the increase of expenditure. As to the Committee on Agriculture, the Committee on Military Affairs, the Committee on Naval Affairs, and the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, it is a fact that there has been an extraordinary increase in the business of the Departments to which the work of those committees respectively relate, and the increases which have been made in the appropriations have been, for the most part, recognized by the House and the country as proper increases.

I submit that in order to make a case against this proposition on the ground that on account of the distribution of these several appropriation bills there has been an increase of expenditure (even if this increase were attributable to the separation of these appropriation bills), it should be shown that the increase is an improper increase. This has not been shown. On the contrary, in the case of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads it is clearly shown that the increase has been a necessary one. So with the Committee on Naval Affairs; that committee has been engaged in making recommendations, which the House and the country have approved, for the increase of our naval armament. I do not doubt that such increases as were made in the legitimate conduct of the other Departments referred to were not made without bringing to the people a full equivalent therefor.

But I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BYNUM] is grossly deceived about the line which he supposes now to exist between the legislation proposed by the District Committee of this House and the appropriations carrying the legislation into effect. The fact is that a great deal of the most important legislation for this District is not considered at all by the Committee on the District of Columbia, but comes directly from the Committee on Appropriations. They assume to legislate for the extension of railroad and other charters, the improvement of streets, and many other subjects wholly disconnected with the matter of appropriations. If you will turn to the appropriation bills applicable to this District, you will find that they go into the very minutest details on the application of the money to be expended under laws not then existing, but created by the act making the appropriation. They create the necessity for an appropriation, then follow it up with the appropriation. So that under the practice that obtains to-day these two matters are not kept separate. It might be well if they were.

Mr. COMPTON. Mr. Speaker, if personal considerations controlled my views of this case I should vote for the motion submitted by my friend from South Carolina [Mr. HEMPHILL]. I never seek responsibility, but never seek to avoid it, but am always ready to do what the obligation of duty imposes upon me.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I propose very briefly to reply to the speech made by my friend from South Carolina in advocacy of this proposition which he has submitted. As I heard his speech and as I read that speech in the RECORD, the gentleman made two suggestions and gave only two reasons for the proposed change. The first is that the committee of thirteen men were better qualified to determine a question of appropriations for the District of Columbia than a subcommittee of five members.

I insist, Mr. Speaker, that this is neither ingenious, disingenuous, nor tenable. Does not the gentleman know that his committee, as well as the Committee on Appropriations, is divided into subcommittees, and that to one or another of these subcommittees every bill is referred for consideration and report to the general committee, and that the general committee then considers the entire bill? And, sir, as I said, his argument is neither ingenious, disingenuous, nor tenable, because in this case the Committee on Appropriations is composed of fifteen members, and his committee of but thirteen members.

But, sir, the further reason, or argument, if I may so denominate it, upon which the gentleman relied in advocacy of his proposition is the suggestion that the District Committee, being one which had knowledge of the wants of the District, having to consider objects with reference to District matters, therefore were best informed on legislation with reference to the appropriations for the District.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman's argument proves too much. First, sir, let me say that this debate has demonstrated that it is not by any means a decided proposition that this distribution of the appropriations has been a success. But even if it has, sir, I say again, the gentleman's argument proves too much. If the condition of things which I have described, speaking of the qualifications of the Committee on the District of Columbia for the consideration of this bill, be true, as he suggests, it is equally true that the Committee on the Judiciary should equally be charged with the consideration of appropriations for the judiciary, and it is equally true that the Committee on Indian Affairs would be best qualified to handle every measure of appropriations for Indian affairs, and all other appropriations would go to other committees.

But I maintain that under the present condition of affairs no valid reason can be assigned for the change proposed by my friend from South Carolina; and until some better reason is assigned I am satisfied, sir, that the good sense and the better judgment of this House will not accede to the proposed change.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I happened to be in the Congress of the United States which made the change in the rules which had so long existed, to have all the appropriations made for the support of the Government given to the consideration and judgment of a single committee. When I came into Congress this committee had the absolute power, as it has now, of taking the floor whenever it wanted to upon any proposition; and the chairman of that committee doled out the time to members as he thought fit, dividing it equally, of course, between the sides. It was in opposition to this power of the Committee on Appropriations, wielded with a despotic hand, that the House, in the Forty-eighth or Forty-ninth Congress, rose and divided this power of making the appropriations, so that they now rest with the other great committees of the House in each case.

The Naval Committee has the power of making the appropriations for the Navy, and so on with the other committees, as has been referred to by my friend from Maryland [Mr. COMPTON] who has just taken his seat. I say it was because of this extraordinary power that the members of the Forty-eighth or Forty-ninth Congress—I think it was the Forty-ninth—rose in opposition to this rule, and took from the general Appropriations Committee the power which it had previously exercised, and I think wisely committed it to the respective committees appointed under the rules having charge of legislation for the various Departments of the Government.

I remember very well, Mr. Speaker, and to show how despotic was the power, on one occasion, shortly after I took my seat in Congress as a young member, and after I had been here two or three months, not having opened my mouth, my distinguished and lamented friend Mr. Randall of Pennsylvania was chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, and he introduced a certain bill. Some friends of mine were telling him, "There is a member here who would like to say a few words on the matter which is now under debate." Mr. Randall turned round, and you know it was his habit, when he was very scrutinizing in his glance, to close one of his eyes. He very fiercely looked me all over and said, "Is that he?" "Yes," said my friend, "and he wants to speak, Mr. Randall." "Well," said he, "he is a young member, and there is no telling what in the thunder he will say, and I shall not let him speak;" and I did not.

It was this sort of exercise of power by the Appropriations Committee which was rebelled against, if I may use that term, in the Forty-eighth and Forty-ninth Congresses, when the powers were distributed. I have never seen any reason why that distribution should not have been extended to the Committee on the District of Columbia. My honorable friend from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] and my honorable friend from Maryland [Mr. COMPTON], in giving their approbation to, and voting for, the distribution of the powers of the Appropriations Committee among the other great committees of the House, gave no reason why the same principle should not apply to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and it seems to me there is no good reason. Why? What was the principle upon which that distribution of power was made? It was that under the rules a committee was created for each one of the great Departments of Government, whose duty it was to consider the appropriations to be made to carry on that Department.

Now, there is no more important committee than the Committee on the District of Columbia, and why should not the thirteen gentlemen of that committee, of whom I am not one and never have been—why, I ask, should not those thirteen gentlemen who have the affairs of the District of Columbia under consideration be trusted by this House to determine the question of the character and nature and amount of the appropriations for the District of Columbia? The general Appropriations Committee is burdened with a vast amount of business; necessarily so. This Committee on the District of Columbia is a specific committee, created with particular powers and duties applicable to the affairs of this District. Why, then, should not they be better qualified to determine what expenditures shall be made for the District of Columbia, in what particular way and of what particular amounts, than the general Appropriations Committee?

The District Committee hear the evidence, hear the statements that are made by citizens of this District or by citizens of the United States; they hear the proofs, they know the facts, why should they not determine the question? Now, according to the present method with reference to the affairs of this District, the District Committee hear the evidence, pass upon all the questions relating to the District that come before them, and then have to refer the matter over to the Appropriations Committee to determine the amount that shall be appropriated—a committee which has not heard one word of the evidence adduced, which presumably does not know anything about the subjects, which may arbitrarily cut the amount down or arbitrarily raise it.

Surely we can trust this District Committee, appointed for this specific business, as properly as we trust the Committee on Military Affairs, the Committee on Naval Affairs, or any other of the great committees of this House. I believe, Mr. Speaker, the first great departure in this matter was made when my friend from Missouri [Mr. HATCH], who has been so long chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, insisted, with reference to the great Agricultural Department of the Government (which was simply a Bureau, but is now a Department), that his committee ought to have a right to recommend the appropriations as well as to consider subjects pertaining to that Department; and I can not see any reason why the same principle should not apply to the Committee on the District of Columbia as well as to the Committee on Agriculture or any other great committee of this House.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, it will be remembered that yesterday my friend from South Carolina [Mr. HEMPHILL] referred to the fact that committees like to get hold of all the power they can. That is true. They are like courts; they favor their own jurisdiction. The truth of the gentleman's text has been manifested by the spirit which he has shown in this struggle so far as it has gone. He stated in the outset that no good reason had been offered why the Appropriations Committee should have control of the District of Columbia appropriation bill. I call his attention to the rules of the Forty-ninth Congress and to the last paragraph of the twentieth rule of that Congress. The Committee on Rules at that time consisted of three distinguished gentlemen on the Democratic side, Mr. CARLISLE, Mr. Randall, and Mr. Morrison, and, on the part of the minority, Mr. HISCOCK and Mr. REED. Those gentlemen, when they brought in the rule which took a large number of bills from the Committee on Appropriations, leaving it only six—I believe there are fourteen general appropriation bills altogether that come before the House—that committee, I say, when they brought in their report recommending the change, added this to the twentieth rule:

> As there is no local or municipal government in the District of Columbia, the duties of the committee having charge of its affairs in the House are to a large extent both executive and legislative in their nature. Experience has shown that the great number of matters now requiring the attention of that committee occupy all the time it can devote to them. It has not been considered proper, under these circumstances, to impose upon it the additional labor of preparing the bill making appropriations for the support of the District of Columbia, and that bill is left with the Committee on Appropriations.

That, Mr. Speaker, was the judgment of CARLISLE, Randall, Morrison, HISCOCK, and REED, and of the House of Representatives of the Forty-ninth Congress in its entirety. If the argument was good then, certainly now, with a vastly increased population and largely increased drafts upon the powers of the Committee on the District of Columbia, it ought to be good in this Congress.

Reference was made by my friend from South Carolina [Mr. HEMPHILL] to the bill which was passed providing for a water supply for this District, and the discussion has gone out into fields not germane to the question at issue. The gentleman from South Carolina unfortunately introduced that case as an argument why this bill should be taken from the Appropriations Committee. It has been admitted in debate that that bill never emanated from that committee, but was born in the District Committee of the Senate, came over here, was referred to the House District Committee, was reported by them to the House, and passed this body. That is all there is in issue. The gentleman from South Carolina tendered it, and the result is that it has no application to the Committee on Appropriations. I was one of the subcommittee that investigated that matter in the Forty-ninth Congress, the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON] being the chairman of that subcommittee. I think it was the unanimous judgment of the subcommittee that the error lay with the engineers, and safeguards were provided to correct that error and prevent its recurrence. But that, I repeat, is neither here nor there.

Now, I beg to ask the gentleman from South Carolina to consider another question, namely, how much of courtesy is shown by this proposed action to the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Appropriations or to that committee as a body, when (as has been the custom for years) they have had this District bill before them in pursuance of the estimates, and have actually entered upon its consideration, as in fact the present Committee on Appropriations have done and are doing. I hold in my hand the District of Columbia appropriation bill. For days the Appropriations Committee have been considering it. Witnesses have been heard, the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, the engineers, and different officers; the committee have heard the statements of those witnesses in great detail, and they are at work almost daily upon the bill. Now, it is a question for the gentleman to consider whether the proprieties which govern legislative bodies are not somewhat strained when it is sought to take this bill out of the hands of a gentleman like the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, to say nothing of his associates.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be allowed to continue for five minutes longer.

Mr. HEARD. I will consent to that if a like courtesy is to be extended to gentlemen upon the other side.

Mr. DOCKERY. It will come out of the time of this side.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request that the time of the gentleman from Iowa be extended for five minutes?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I do not know that I shall consume all that time, as I have only a few additional thoughts to present.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if the argument is sound in favor of taking the appropriations for the District of Columbia from the Committee on Appropriations, I call the attention of my friend from South Carolina to this question: Why would it not be equally proper to let the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds report the appropriations for public buildings? As a rule that has not been deemed by Congress a safe thing to be done. Why not allow the Committee on Invalid Pensions to take from the Committee on Appropriations the pension appropriation bill? Why should not the Committee on Invalid Pensions—a committee that has all the special knowledge on these subjects, except what we acquire by work—be permitted to bring in the pension appropriation bill? Why should not the Committee on War Claims or the Committee on Private Land Claims, which have knowledge of all the facts touching the particular claims reported by them, be permitted to bring into the House the appropriations for the payment of those claims? According to the argument of the gentleman, these committees would be better equipped than any other committee perhaps to bring in bills making appropriations of this character.

Again, we have certain committees on the expenditures of the different Departments—the State Department, the War Department, the Navy Department, the Treasury Department. These committees are appointed expressly to investigate the expenditures of these different Departments. Why should not my friend from South Carolina come in here and plead with equal fairness and vigor in favor of giving to those committees the right to report the appropriations for their patricular Departments.

Mr. Speaker, I voted in the Forty-ninth Congress for the separation of these appropriation bills as then determined upon. My experience and observation since that time rather incline me to think that if I should now vote again upon that proposition I would not go to the extent I then did. Certain it is that the Committee on Appropriations has now left to it only six of the fourteen regular appropriation bills. I am ignorant of a single State in which the appropriations for various State purposes are not left in the State Legislature to the jurisdiction of a single appropriation committee. The only exception to this line of action, so far as I have knowledge, is the step taken by this House in the Forty-ninth Congress. Mr. Speaker, I emphatically and earnestly counsel this House not to entertain with favor the proposition of the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Mr. Speaker, how much time remains on the other side?

The SPEAKER. Ten minutes are left in opposition to the proposition, and twenty minutes in its favor.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I wish to say only a few words in reply. If any gentleman on the other side wants to speak I would be glad if he would occupy the time now.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina is recognized.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Mr. Speaker, this matter has excited a good deal more interest than I anticipated it would. As to the amount of money which may be expended I do not think either committee is likely to be extravagant. In replying this morning to the gentleman from Indiana who first spoke [Mr. HOLMAN], I undertook to show that the figures which he had used told against him with more power than they did against anybody else.

Some of the other gentlemen who have participated in this debate have undertaken to turn against me an argument which I made with reference to the bill making appropriation for the waterworks of this District. These gentlemen—the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE], the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS], and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON]—forgot to tell the House that after this work had gone far enough to ascertain its real merits, the Committee on Appropriations added $1,000,000 to the appropriations that had already been reported by the District Committee. Therefore, so far as concerns the figures of this question, it seems to me that gentlemen who are so anxious to retain this District appropriation bill in the hands of the Appropriations Committee have not supported their position very successfully.

Several gentlemen have undertaken to put some questions in reference to this matter, and I wish to refer to them; but before doing so let me say a word to my friend from Indiana [Mr. BYNUM], whose argument does not seem to rise above "terrapin and champagne." He has stated that the District Committee has under the rules a certain time appropriated to its business. But, unfortunately, that committee does not get the amount of time assigned to it by the rules, and it is unfair to say that our committee has already one-twelfth of the time of this House. As a matter of fact, well known in the experience of the House, we do not receive any such courtesy at the hands of this body.

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] has referred to the rule adopted in the Forty-ninth Congress, for which he voted and for which the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] voted, distributing the appropriation bills amongst the different committees. He cites the names of certain distinguished Democrats and Republicans who at that time gave their reasons why the District appropriations should not be turned over to the District Committee. I wish to answer that line of argument by referring the gentleman to the debate in the Senate of the United States on the 20th of December, 1883, when the Committee on Rules of that body, consisting in part of Mr. FRYE of Maine, Mr. SHERMAN of Ohio, Mr. Ingalls of Kansas, Mr. HARRIS of Tennessee, and one or two distinguished Democrats whose names I have not now on my tongue, reported that the District appropriation bill should be sent to the District Committee, for the reason that the people of this District have no representation on the floor of Congress; that their only opportunity to be heard is to make known their wants to the District Committee, and because one-half the appropriations made for the District are paid out of the revenues raised by the people of the District themselves.

And I say to you, sir, that the argument which these gentlemen adduce in favor of popular rights, on behalf of the people of the District of Columbia having some representation on this floor, is a far better argument to use than that which has been adduced by the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him for a question?

Mr. HEMPHILL. Certainly.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. Is it not true that the Appropriations Committee of the Senate have charge of all of the appropriation bills?

Mr. HEMPHILL. They do now, as a matter of fact, and the reason was, as the debate to which I have referred shows, that when they gave this right to the District of Columbia Committee the other committees came in and insisted upon a distribution of the appropriations belonging properly to their respective committees, and having adopted the resolution giving to the Committee on the District of Columbia charge of the appropriations for the District, the measure was so loaded down by amendments that it was killed before it could get through.

Now, I do not ask, Mr. Speaker, that the other bills shall be referred to the other committees of the House, as has been suggested by the gentleman from Iowa, because it is just as much as I can do to attend to my own business on this floor. If the other committees want their bills, let them get up and demand them. But I want to impress on the House this one thing, that the District of Columbia is managed by two committees. There has been wasteful extravagance of the public money here, and the Committee on Appropriations can not and will not deny it. No man here will deny that there have been millions of dollars spent here for which there has been no return. The only question, then, is whether there can be any improvement made in the administration of the affairs of this District; and it is a question for this House, not "smeared up with champagne and terrapin;" for I take it that no honest man, if he wants to be honest, will find difficulty in resisting any such temptations as that.

The question is whether in the administration of the public funds and those derived by taxation from the people of this District an improvement can be made and affairs be better managed by thirteen men who understand their wants than by other men who have a large number of appropriation bills belonging to other subjects to attend to?

I want to call the attention of the House, Mr. Speaker, to the suggestion of the distinguished gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER], and that is, that if the bill is kept now in the hands of the Appropriations Committee, and the power is given to these gentlemen to legislate upon appropriation bills, as it is proposed to do under these rules, then the balance of the committees of this House might just as well abdicate their authority and the members go home. For under the rules they have the right to come in at any time with any bill carrying an appropriation of public money, and if this other amendment is adopted they will have the right to incorporate new legislation upon appropriation bills. The result is that they will be the masters of the House, and every member of this body not a member of the Committee on Appropriations will find the moment that he gets up a bill here for consideration and discussion in the House, and its consideration or its passage is objected to by gentlemen of the Appropriations Committee, or if they do not like it, they will simply put one of their bills on the track with legislation in it, and thus prevent the consideration of the other measure.

That will be the exact condition of things in this body. Other bills will be interposed from that committee to shut out measures in which members not on the Committee on Appropriations may be interested. The balance of this House, sent here to represent their constituents, as well as the members of the Appropriations Committee, will be wiped out of existence, and they had just as well make up their minds to that now. And, Mr. Speaker, it is not so with reference to this particular bill alone, but with reference to six separate and distinct bills which the Committee on Appropriations have in charge, and there is no difficulty in the Committee on Appropriations—no rule existing heretofore, and far more is that the case under the proposed rule—there is no difficulty in taking from the members of this House the right to consider or discuss measures that will be important to the welfare of the country and their immediate constituents if they do not commend themselves to the Appropriations Committee. And while I know that some gentlemen have gone around the House to make protest privately to members against this proposition, while I know that arguments have been made privately to members which have not been made publicly on the floor, I warn you gentlemen that if this committee is put in charge of this bill and the other appropriation bills, with the right to legislate upon them, the large majority of you might as well go home and draw your salaries there as to sit here and expect to do any legislation. It is well known that these appropriations were distributed and taken from the hands of the Appropriations Committee simply because they were the masters of the House and had throttled every man and measure at their own will.

Mr. HEARD. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. HEMPHILL. Certainly.

Mr. HEARD. Is it not a fact that under the rules heretofore existing the Committee on Appropriations have legislated, even to the amendment of railroad charters, and put new legislation into their bills?

Mr. HEMPHILL. Certainly.

Mr. HEARD. And is it not a further fact that where our committee secured the passage of a bill, such for instance as the Reform School for Girls in this District, the Appropriations Committee defeated the object of the bill by withholding the appropriation, thus nullifying the action of Congress, and afterwards refused even to allow us to amend the bill to give it power and effect?

Mr. HEMPHILL. Certainly. The Committee on Appropriations even under the old rules had power to defeat almost any legislation in the same way. You may pass any measure you please, and if the Appropriations Committee does not see fit to give the money it is nullified. A marked instance of this is the case to which the gentleman from Missouri has just alluded, the legislation for the establishment of a Reform School for Girls in this District.

I have here the appropriation bill of the last Congress, passed under the direction of the Appropriations Committee, in which there are four or five sections of legislation, and legislation which has never been referred to the committee charged with the legislation for the District of Columbia.

The whole question boils itself down to this: First, as to whether it is beneficial to the public service that this bill should be given to a committee that has charge of these matters, and next as to whether the members upon this floor are willing to abdicate their rights and turn over the whole business to the control of one committee.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the amendment proposed by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HEMPHILL].

The amendment was disagreed to.

The Clerk continued the reading of the paragraph.

Having read as follows:

To commerce, Life-Saving Service, and light-houses, other than appropriations for Life-Saving Service and light-houses: to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the gentleman having the rules in charge to an omission in clause 7. The title of the Committee on Commerce was changed to "Interstate and Foreign Commerce," and this rule provides that these matters shall be referred to the "Committee on Commerce." Before the word "Commerce" should be inserted the words "Interstate and Foreign."

Mr. MCMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, that was the intention of the majority; but in copying the rules for the printer there was an omission.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the correction will be made by the Clerk.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the improvement of rivers and harbors: to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend paragraph 8 of Rule XI by adding the words "except the Mississippi River" immediately after the word "harbors;" so that said paragraph as amended will read:

"To the improvement of rivers and harbors, except the Mississippi River: to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors."

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, the object of this amendment is to take away from the Committee on Rivers and Harbors the jurisdiction of questions pertaining to the Mississippi River and vest that jurisdiction in the Committee on Levees and Improvements of the Mississippi River, so as to give this last-named committee a jurisdiction coextensive with its name.

I desire to call the attention of the House to the fact that there are two committees, each of which have partial jurisdiction of questions affecting the improvement of the Mississippi River.

Section 8 commits to the jurisdiction of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors all questions affecting rivers and harbors. Paragraph 23 commits to the jurisdiction of the Committee on Levees and Improvements of the Mississippi River simply the question of levees. Now, when it is understood that the system of levee improvements is only one of the factors in the question of the improvement of the Mississippi River, one of the facts going to make up a general whole, then it will be understood, it seems to me, at once that this amendment ought to be adopted, or else the Committee on Levees and Improvements of the Mississippi River ought to be abolished. I say it is simply one of the factors in a general system that goes to make up a general whole. I desire to read from a report that was made by the Committee on Levees and Improvements of the Mississippi River at the last session, a statement from Col. Suter, a member of the Mississippi River Commission, which was embraced in that report. Col. Suter said in his report:

The Commission reported upon all three plans, and then made their recommendations as to what they proposed.

The so-called outlet plan was condemned in toto. The plan of improving the navigation by levees alone was not adopted by the Commission.

Col. Suter says further in the same report:

From this point of view the function of the levee system may be considered as conservative; its other function confers a direct benefit. The plan of the Commission contemplated both of these functions in these three factors; that is, the channel contraction works, the revetment of the banks, and the levees on the top of the banks, constitute the plan on which the Commission has worked from that day to this.

Now, it seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that if the question of the improvement of the Mississippi River is to be considered intelligently, systematically, and economically, then the whole jurisdiction ought to be put into the hands of one committee, because it is probable that there will be a conflict of jurisdiction. It is almost certain that there will be a conflict of views; and I say, then, that to consider intelligently all of these questions, this being only a factor in the general whole, they ought to be considered in one committee.

Another thing, Mr. Speaker. This Committee on Rivers and Harbors has a vast deal of work before it. The time of the committee is occupied with the presentation of claims affecting rivers and harbors all over this entire country. It does seem to me that if this Committee on Levees and Improvements of the Mississippi River is to have any other function than to be ornamental, then the interests of this great river, the Mississippi, embracing matters of such importance to this entire people, ought to be intrusted to the hands of one committee and let it have jurisdiction of all the questions relating to its improvement, channel improvements, the protection of the banks by revetment and otherwise, and the system of levees, all combined and constituting one complete system——

Mr. BUSHNELL. Would that include the Upper Mississippi as well as the Lower?

Mr. NORTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. BUSHNELL. The whole river?

Mr. NORTON. Yes, sir; that is just what I desire.

Mr. COGSWELL. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN], who yesterday was advocating the adoption of the rules reported by the committee, in a speech intended, of course, not for political effect, but to inform this House how best it could proceed with its business, stated that under the rules of the last Congress, the terrible rules of the czar, we had appropriated $275,000 for the Butler Building and $150,000 for the Richards Building. He omitted to say that, under those rules, a single objection would have stricken those two items from the bill. He also stated that the two buildings together were not worth over $300,000. In regard to the Butler Building, a commission appointed by an Administration [Cleveland] of his own choosing, at the head of which was Secretary Fairchild, valued it at $277,000, and the Fifty-first Congress obtained it for $275,000.

Furthermore, the Government at that time was paying $7,200 for the rent of one-third of that building, and we bought the whole building for $275,000, showing that in rent or interest, as you may put it, a great saving was made. So much for the rules of the Fifty-first Congress, which he held up to us yesterday as so frightful. Had he had the same fervor then as now, and these expenditures were as wrongful as he suggests, he could have objected, which would have stricken them out of the bill; but as a matter of expenditure that purchase saved to the Government several thousand dollars a year in the interest of rent account alone.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Speaker, I rise to address a few words to the House in opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. NORTON]. Those of us in this House who have for many years been interested in the Mississippi River do not ask that it be separated in any such way as is proposed from the regular river and harbor bill. I believe that the interests of that river would be safer on the regular river and harbor bill than it would be in a separate measure. We know that no bill before this House is stronger and more popular than the regular river and harbor bill, and we believe that the interests of the Mississippi River would be best subserved by leaving it in connection with the appropriations voted for the rivers and harbors of the country.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Let us have a vote, Mr. Speaker.

The question was put, and the amendment of Mr. NORTON was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

10. To agriculture and forestry; to the Committee on Agriculture, who shall receive the estimates and report the appropriations for the Agricultural Department.

Mr. MORSE. I move to strike out the last two words.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized.

Mr. MORSE. On yesterday my friend from Mississippi [Gen. CATCHINGS] referred to a remark made by me during the debate on the rules in the last House as an unfulfilled prophecy. He said:

I am reminded by the presence of my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. MORSE] that when the rules of that Congress were up for consideration and this "quorum" question was being discussed, that gentleman rose and with passionate fluency or fluent passion, whichever it may have been, said that if this House did not adopt those rules there would not be pontoons enough to bridge gentlemen back into this House.

Well, sir, they adopted their system of rules and the pontoons were called for but denied them. They had to walk the plank, and almost every man of them slipped and, like McGinty, went to the bottom of the sea.

The exact language used by me in a speech delivered in this House February 12, 1890, and referred to by the gentleman from Mississippi I find to be as follows from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I said:

It has been clearly demonstrated during this debate that under the former rules one solitary member could obstruct the whole business of the country, and it is high time under republican form of government that the Congress of the United States should become republican, and that a majority of its members should be able to transact its business. It has been said on the other side that the people were in favor of this policy of obstruction by the minority, and the proposition to amend the rules has been denounced as revolutionary.

Not so do I hear or read the voice of the people, but I am overwhelmed with letters from my constituents indorsing the position taken by the Republicans on this floor; and if our Democratic brethren are content to go before the country upon the issue that a majority shall not control the legislation of the country and of this House I am content: and when they hear from the people I am sure it will be in utter condemnation of their course on this floor, and I believe that the Latin maxim would apply, Vox populi, vox Dei.

It is said that at the battle of Pittsburg Landing (or Shiloh, as the gentlemen on the other side preferred to call it) one of Gen. Grant's subordinates suggested to him that the pontoons for crossing the river were not sufficient to cover a retreat. Gen. Grant's reply is historical, that if they were beaten in the pending battle, the pontoons would be sufficient for all that would be left of his army. Now, Mr. Speaker, I too, am neither a prophet nor the son of a prophet, but unless these rules are amended so that the Fifty-first Congress shall give some needed business legislation to the country, it will not take many pontoons to carry the members of this Congress that will be elected to the next.

The prophecy of a great change in the House, it seems, was fulfilled, but that I confess in a different manner from that which I expected. [Laughter.] It may not be out of place to consider some of the causes that led to the change.

Massachusetts is at present represented on this floor by seven Democratic Congressmen and five Republicans. The Democratic members are all gentlemen of high character and ability; Massachusetts sends no other. I have not a word to say against them; some of them are friends of mine; but the truth compels me to say that Massachusetts is at present misrepresented on this floor.

On the basis of the vote for lieutenant-governor and all the State officers but the governor, at the recent election, we should now be represented in the thirteen new districts by ten Republicans and three Democrats; and Governor Russell owes his re-election to three causes:

First. His personal popularity, together with the unfortunate labor record of the Republican candidate, Allen.

Second. Third party prohibitionists, who cast a direct vote undoubtedly for the head of the Democratic ticket in the light of recent developments.

But the third and most important reason was that Governor Russell denied on the stump nearly every Democratic doctrine.

He denied that his party stood for the free and unlimited coinage of silver. Every man on this floor knows that is false, from the Speaker down to the humblest member. He even went so far as to charge that the Republican party was the cheap-money party.

The fourth and important reason was, that he represented the Democratic party as in favor of "free raw material." I have not heard a breath since this Congress convened from any Western or Southern Democrat on the subject of "free raw material;" that talk is used to elect Democratic Congressmen in New England. The Mills bill continued a high duty upon coal, iron, and sugar, all Southern products. "Cheap manufactured goods" is the cry of the Democratic party to-day.

My friend, Governor McCREARY of Kentucky, introduced a bill under the first call of the States to put woolen goods, agricultural implements, edged tools, and cordage on the free list. This may be fun for Kentucky, but I tell you, Mr. Speaker, and gentlemen of the House of Representatives, it is death to Massachusetts. If that bill ever reaches consideration under these rules, like the free silver bill, it will pass this House by a large majority, and if it could pass a Republican Senate and a Republican President it would close factories in New England and turn thousands of workmen into the street, or reduce their wages to the level of European wages. Not free raw material, but "free silver and free manufactured goods;" "These be thy gods, O, Israel."

At the recent election Massachusetts elected every State officer but the governor by a Republican majority of 11,000, and increased its Republican majority in the House of Representatives and in the State senate, and it is not regarded as much of a Democratic victory when the facts are known.

But how about the election of seven Congressmen in 1890, if Massachusetts is a Republican State? I claim, Mr. Speaker, that that was brought about by gross misrepresentations of the McKinley tariff bill.

Let me give you a few illustrations. Night after night the Democratic candidate for lieutenant-governor, Mr. Cochran, appealed to the poor men to vote the Democratic ticket and against the McKinley bill, because he said "the poor man could not build a house any more because the duty on lumber was doubled." His attention was called to the fact that the bill reduced the duty one-half, but he went on repeating the falsehood on the basis, I suppose, that a lie well stuck to was as good as the truth.

Another Democratic orator in describing the McKinley bill cursed the party that would put a duty on Bibles and admit playing cards free. The duty on playing cards is 50 cents a pack, and on the principle that protection reduces the price they are sold for 10 cents a pack.

In one section of the State fish-peddlers were employed to peddle fish. When anybody tried to buy a fish an advance of 3 or 4 cents a pound was charged, and when an explanation of the advance was asked, the answer was, "The McKinley bill." American-caught fish under that bill are admitted free of duty. These were the means used to make Massachusetts Democratic in 1890.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MORSE. I ask for three minutes to finish what I have to say.

Mr. HOAR. I hope it will be granted, for the benefit of the Democratic party in Massachusetts.

Mr. MORSE. My young friend from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] will need benefit and assistance the next time he is a candidate on the Democratic ticket in his district, and I am sure the young gentleman will know more of the financial and tariff policy of the national Democratic party before this session closes than he did during the last campaign in Massachusetts. But, Mr. Speaker, I want to call attention to these fish-peddlers, and perhaps the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] can tell the House where the funds came from to carry on that kind of a campaign. Perhaps the gentleman can also tell us at the same time who furnished the funds to carry on the prohibition campaign in Massachusetts at the last election. It is openly charged that the Democratic State central committee paid Sam Small and Mrs. Gougar to stump the State for the Prohibitory party; and the chairman of the Prohibitory State central committee, Mr. Partridge, when summoned to meet the charge, writes an evasive answer and virtually confesses it is true. Do the people of Massachusetts and the country approve of these false and hypocritical methods of carrying on a campaign? I tell the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] they will not work next time.

During the last campaign the Democratic State central committee sent a circular letter to the rumsellers in Boston soliciting large contributions for the purpose of carrying on their campaign. That paper was printed in the Boston daily papers, and its authenticity was not denied. And it is notorious that the wholesale liquor-dealers in Boston have for years been the largest contributors to the Democratic party. It is notorious that in our State, in every platform and on every stump, the Democratic party denounces prohibition and all sumptuary laws. It is a funny kind of a political temperance party whose speakers are paid by money gotten from the rumsellers in Boston. There are many honest and sincere people among the third party prohibitionists who think that by voting for separate candidates they are standing for a great principle; and I think that they will show their disgust at the next election in Massachusetts, owing to recent developments, and refuse to act as the allies of the free-rum Democratic party. And I predict that the third party prohibitionist vote in our State will be very small at the next election.

Now, Mr. Speaker, a word in reply to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. WATSON], a member of the Farmers' Alliance; he spoke of dire disaster and appalling calamity hanging over the farmers of Kansas and the Northwestern States, where, he said, the farmers were burning their corn for fuel. That speech was evidently gotten up for some other year, or, in the language of the almanacs, "it was not computed for this meridian."

Mr. FUNSTON of Kansas did well to interrupt the gentleman from Georgia, and to brand his statement as untrue, and to say that corn was selling for 40 cents a bushel in Kansas, and to say that that great Empire State of Kansas was prospering under the McKinley bill and kind Providence as never before. [Applause.]

I desire to append to my remarks an extract from a private letter from a gentleman of my acquaintance at Tracy, Minn., in refutation of the statements in the speech of the Farmers' Alliance gentleman from Georgia:

> This section of the Northwest was never in so prosperous a condition as now; although prices are not high, the crops are so bounteous that every farmer's income is much beyond his immediate wants. Hence he is improving his buildings, his carriages, his roads, and is a ready buyer of merchandise and more land. This condition of things leaves the "Alliance" agitators without a text or platform, and everyone is wondering what the "party" or its promoters are to hang their organization on next year. A glorious opportunity for political inventors and discoverers.

The calamity predictions of the Democratic party to the commerce of the country under the provisions of the McKinley bill have not been fulfilled. I clip from the Lowell Courier the following statement of the commerce of Boston. I have no doubt that other ports have made a similar showing:

> The imports at Boston are about $4,000,000 more this year than last, while the exports from the same port are eight and a half millions more than last year. This is how the McKinley tariff "stifles" commerce.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired. Does the gentleman withdraw the pro forma amendment?

Mr. MORSE. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

> 11. to the relations of the United States with foreign nations, including appropriations therefor: to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Speaker, it is remarkable how great a noise can emanate from a fish horn when attached to the nozzle of a bloated bellows. It can be heard farther and produce a more startling effect upon the ear than the grandest oratorio, or even the music of the spheres; and it has, too, another advantage in its favor. An oratorio is possible only as a result of genius, and the heavenly harmonies but reflect the beauty and grandeur of creative power; but a fish horn can be easily operated without brains. Often during the past few weeks the greasy leather bellowers of Republicanism have forced foul air through the rusty fish horns of arrogance and assumption, producing the discordant noises of brainless buffoonery.

There is a circus in town. [Laughter.]

Mr. BUCHANAN of New Jersey. There has been one in town ever since the first Monday in December.

Mr. BUTLER. A grand, royal combination; the great and only monopolistic aggregation; the allied union of protective operators from robbers' roost, whose like has never been equaled in reality, and never even in fiction, except by the Arabian Nights story of Ali Baba and the Forty Thieves, has sounded the fish horn at the entrance of its tent, announcing the grand opening, with more pharisees to the dozen than ever walked the hills of Judea or shouted their own praises in the streets of old Jerusalem. Such men talk to us of the duties of statesmanship, or attempt to define the operations of true economy!

The people demand economy, and they respond with ridicule. The country asks for frugality, efficiency, and honest administration of affairs, and calls a halt on extravagant expenditures. The clowns of that circus cry, "Let the robbery go on. This is no nickel-in-the-slot machine. We are for the trappings of royalty and the tinsel of the arena. The public be damned."

And as for statesmanship, what is their comprehension of so grand a figure?

To my mind a statesman, Mr. Speaker, is a man broad enough to understand the principles upon which the Government is based and to comprehend the needs of his people. A statesman is a man who has sufficient ingenuity and creative power to plan to meet the calls of the people for relief, and to overcome the causes which have made the relief necessary. A statesman is a man who knows enough to know that he is the servant and not the master of the people, and who has courage to stand by the needs of the people until exact justice is secured.

Mr. RAINES. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. BUTLER. I would prefer that the gentleman would wait till I get through, because my time is very limited.

Mr. RAINES. It is a simple question. I only wanted to ask him if there were any of those gentlemen left in Iowa? [Laughter.]

Mr. BUTLER. Any of them left in Iowa?

Mr. RAINES. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. Well, Mr. Speaker, such men as the gentleman would call statesmen are no more to be compared with statesmen than the skunk-cabbage on the hills of New York to the giant redwood of the vales of California [laughter]; no more to be compared to statesmen than the bleating calf to the roaring lion; no more to be compared to statesmen than the carrion crow to the bird of paradise, or a dunghill to a diamond. [Laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, with arrogant assumption the Republican party claim that they alone are the patriots of this country, when every act of legislation in regard to the commercial intercourse of this country with foreign nations has been an insult to the American flag, and has reflected neither faith nor pride in our country, the home of democratic simplicity and democratic power. [Applause on the Democratic side.] They have compared our country with other nations of the earth, and, for shame, they declare our inability to compete with other nations on equal terms in the ordinary affairs of life.

Mr. McCREARY. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended for five minutes.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. BUTLER. They hold our industrial centers as pauper communities, only able to survive in the struggle for wealth by the help of the taxgatherer, who collects the tithes from the many homes of toil to scatter fatness in the larders of its masters. By its laws it declares our inability to cope with foreign powers, and yet with its lips it prates of its remarkable patriotism. The Democratic party responds to these croakers of monopoly with patriotic spirit. We look abroad upon our land and see the grandest display of natural resources ever given to mankind. We see our coal fields broader and better than any other continent can boast. Our forests, with their great varieties of woods, eclipse the lumber regions of all competing lands. Our mines produce in exhaustless mass the ores, both useful and precious, from iron to gold. Our fields are white with more and better cotton than the whole known world outside can furnish. Our water powers surpass in availability and grandeur the wheel-propelling streams of other lands. We see that rapidity of operation and accuracy in detail are the characteristics of the American producer. We see all this, and then declare, with patriotic ardor, that America is the natural home of progress; the mother of productive arts; a leader, and not a mere competitor, among the nations of the world. The Republican party sees danger in commercial intercourse with foreign lands, and counts the open highway of the seas a menace to our prosperity. They have been consistent in the laws which have driven our ships from the commercial world and given over all ocean carriage to be handled under foreign flags. Is this the patriotism of which you boast? But now they would undertake to rebuild by subsidy the very commerce they destroyed by tax.

The Democratic party, Mr. Speaker, holds a broader and nobler view. We declare the truth, which is accepted by the commercial world as in harmony with reason, demonstrated by experience, and noted in the history of nations, that where the center of trade and commerce is, there is the center of dollars. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Talk about patriotism! Patriotism means both faith in and love of country. We yield to no man in our love of country and its glorious flag, but we believe it is as much the duty of an American citizen to live for his country as to die for it. We pledge our living energies to protect our sacred institutions under the banner of frugality, efficiency, and honest administration of affairs. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The Clerk read as follows:

35. The examination of the accounts and expenditures of the several Departments of the Government and the manner of keeping the same; the economy, justness, and correctness of such expenditures; their conformity with appropriation laws; the proper application of public moneys; the security of the Government against unjust and extravagant demands; retrenchment; the enforcement of the payment of moneys due to the United States; the economy and accountability of public officers; the abolishment of useless offices; the reduction or increase of the pay of officers, shall all be subjects within the jurisdiction of the eight standing committees on the public expenditures in the several Departments, as follows:

Mr. DE FOREST. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word of the paragraph just read. Without professing any special familiarity with the rules of this House, either past, present, or prospective, I may perhaps be indulged in one or two observations which have occurred to my mind during the progress of this debate. And, sir, I was impressed, as one of the gentlemen from Kansas said he was, with the singularity of the attitude taken by gentlemen representing the different political parties on this floor in this discussion. I was listening with a great deal of interest and curiosity to ascertain if I could what was the real ground of objection in the minds of our Republican friends to the code of rules here proposed. One would suppose from the remarks which fell from the lips of some of the gentlemen that they were complaining because too great liberty, too great a control over the deliberations and proceedings of this body, was vested in the minority under the operation of these proposed rules, and that in this way the majority would be subjected to certain restraints and limitations which would prevent them from exercising their power, if they were so disposed, in an arbitrary, unjust, and unpatriotic manner.

But, sir, I can hardly conceive that this is the real ground of their objection, because it so happens that they constitute, as was observed by the gentleman from Kansas, the minority, that under these rules would be clothed with these wholesome privileges and protections, and we are the majority that would be subjected to those salutary restraints; and it is not in accordance with the history or the practice of the Republican party to take exception to anything, whether good or bad, that will inure to their political advantage. I think, sir, the real secret of this opposition was betrayed, inadvertently perhaps, by one gentleman, when in a distrustful and disconsolate tone of voice he quoted that now antiquated and oft-repeated proverb that the Democratic party can always be relied upon to forfeit its opportunity of victory by timely blunders.

It seems to me (and I am very much mistaken if it is not so) that the real secret of the unhappiness of the Republican side of the House is that those gentleman find the Democratic majority to-day is not disposed to follow in their unworthy footsteps. So confidently had they expected apparently that they would receive that vindictive treatment which they knew they deserved, and that the unpleasant cup which they prepared for their adversaries would be held to their own lips, that really it is a good deal of a shock and disappointment to them to find that they are not able, at considerable personal and party inconvenience, to hold us up to odium as having employed the same instrumentalities and means of tyranny which they so gleefully used in the last Congress. It seems to me, sir, that this is the explanation.

Now, then, we do not profess to be infallible. We humbly pray, sir, that we may have very little of that pharasaical spirit which our Republican friends seem to possess so much of—walking about erect and self-satisfied, thanking God that they are not like other people—a spirit which I think was exemplified in the address of the honorable gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] the other day, when he spent an hour or more glorifying himself and his party and painting in the colors of the caricature or the cartoon distinguished statesmen whom he seemed to be unable to answer in serious debate.

We pray, sir, that we may have very little of that spirit. We do not profess to be infallible; we may make mistakes; but we take a great deal of satisfaction in assuring gentlemen on the other side of the House that we do not propose to gratify them by making the egregious blunder of following the infamous example as regards the rules of this House which was set by them in the last Congress.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. DOCKERY. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be allowed to proceed five minutes more.

There was no objection.

Mr. DE FOREST. Mr. Speaker, we do not propose to make such an egregious blunder as that, thus violating, as we conceive, all of those great elementary, fundamental principles of equal and exact justice which underlie and rise above the privileges of majorities in any form of government, republican or monarchical, and which are recognized and sacredly protected in Magna Chartas, in bills of rights, and constitutions, and by the usages of free men from the very dawn of the era of human liberty. Checks and restrictions seem to be very odious to our Republican friends. They do not like to talk about them or hear about them. A gentleman the other day said, almost with tears in his eyes, that on some one occasion to which he referred, nine days of eight hours each had been expended in obstructive measures by the Democrats of this House. Now, sir, I do not precisely know what was the measure that was hindered in that way, but if it was of such a character as those which were rushed through in the last Congress and imposed upon the country by the Republican party, then, in my humble judgment, those were the best spent hours of that Congressional session.

Mr. DOCKERY. It was such a measure that was opposed in that way.

Mr. DE FOREST. Yes, sir; my experience has taught me that legislation is apt to be too voluminous rather than too scant; too hasty rather than too slow; and I think, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman has not read aright the history of the struggles of the human race to free itself from the shackles of despotic power all along the pathway of time who has not yet discovered that the supreme art in the formation of free governments is the adoption, retention, and the enforcement of those restraints which protect the minority and the humblest individual against the aggressions and tyranny of the many.

Checks and restraints, forsooth, are odious to the gentleman. Nine days of eight hours each, he says, were consumed in the exercise of these privileges of the minority in resisting oppressive legislation. Why, sir, it took our ancestors seven years of bloody war to accomplish the same object and vindicate the same principle, that resistance to tyrants is obedience to God.

Now, then, the gentleman said it was so unfortunate that by the operation of these rules the passage of a bill for the free and unlimited coinage of silver might possibly be obstructed. Does the gentleman mean to say that it is unfortunate, if true? The gentleman from Iowa, or the gentleman from Michigan, I think it was, who made the remark. Does he mean to say that it would be a reproach to these rules and their operation that the passage of such a bill should be prevented or obstructed? Is that his belief? Does he think it unfortunate? Does he think it would be a good thing for the country to have such a bill passed? Is that the gentleman's opinion? If not, Mr. Speaker, why this unhappiness? Unless, perchance, it is one of those blunders he is waiting for the Democratic party to fall into, so, sir, that in the next Presidential election, having secretly promoted the measure, he and his comrades can go ranting about the country in all of the business and financial centers and talk about the unsafe financial principles of the Democratic party.

Now, sir, we do not propose to make any such blunders as that. And I want to say here to-day, because it has been unwarrantably assumed by Republican speakers throughout the country that we are pledged to this legislation—I undertake to say that if a bill for the free and unlimited coinage of silver passes through this Congress, it will not go out with the stamp of the indorsement of the Democratic party upon it.

If any such measure is adopted it will be by the votes of gentlemen of all shades of political opinion and totally irrespective of party lines. And I further say, sir, that it will owe its inception, its progress, and passage, more than to anything else, to the persistent, indefatigable, and selfish intrigue and manipulation of that section of the country which by the Republican party in the last Congress was parceled out in senatorial pocket boroughs to continue its waning supremacy in the United States Senate and supply those places in the electoral college which it had forfeited by its infidelity to public trust.

No, sir; our Republican friends will meet disappointment in their great policy, apparently the only remaining policy of the party of great moral ideas, of watching, waiting, and praying for Democratic blunders. They will go to the country on the infamous record they themselves have made, the record of the robbery of the masses for the enrichment of the few under the guise of revenue legislation; the record of the squandering of the public treasure, thus wrung from the pockets of labor by that unjust and unequal system of taxation in furtherance of partisan objects; and the record of the centralizing and despotic tendencies and practices of their party, which have already met with such emphatic rebuke by the popular voice and which are well exemplified in this attempt by them to break down the immemorial parliamentary safeguards of freedom.

Mr. DINGLEY was recognized.

Mr. DE FOREST. I should like, Mr. Speaker, to have a few moments longer, with the consent of the House, upon this point.

Mr. BUSHNELL. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may be permitted to proceed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I rise simply to get information on a point which has just been suggested by the gentleman last on the floor. I understood the gentleman who has just spoken to give as one of the advantages of the rules proposed, that they will prevent the Democratic party from passing in this House a bill for the free coinage of silver.

Mr. DE FOREST. The gentleman does not understand me to say so. I was quoting from the language of the gentleman on his side of the House.

Mr. DINGLEY. Did I understand the gentleman to say that the Democratic party did not propose to make any such blunder? But I did not rise specially to make inquiry with reference to that point, but more particularly in regard to another. The day before yesterday the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM] proposed an amendment to these rules permitting the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures to report at any time, giving as a reason for that provision the apprehension that a bill, which it was understood the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures proposed to report to the House, providing for the free coinage of silver, would not receive due consideration. But yesterday he withdrew the proposition, stating that he had been assured by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] that there was no necessity for such a provision in the rules, because the matter would be properly cared for in this House. Now, it seems that there must be some misunderstanding on this point; and I think the House may desire some light with reference to it. Has the gentleman from Missouri received the assurance that the Committee on Rules will report to the House a proposition for the consideration of a bill favoring the free coinage of silver—such an assurance as induced him to suggest the withdrawal of the proposed amendment?

Mr. BLAND. I do not know what right the gentleman has to address a question to me when I have not the floor. When I have the floor I will endeavor to enlighten the gentleman from Maine upon a question which seems to cause him considerable apprehension.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman——

Mr. DE FOREST. Mr. Speaker, have I not the floor?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine was recognized.

Mr. DE FOREST. But a motion was made to extend my time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not so understand.

Mr. DINGLEY. I believe I have the floor, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine.

Mr. DINGLEY. In view of the assurances of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] at a Democratic meeting in New York not many days ago that a bill providing for the free coinage of silver would not pass this House, and in view of the further assurance of the gentleman from Texas that he has information from the gentleman from Missouri, who has charge of the bill providing for the free coinage of silver, that such bill will be given a hearing in the House, I think there must be some misunderstanding in reference to it, judging from the remarks of the gentleman who has lately had the floor; and we ought to be frankly informed exactly what is proposed. I rose simply to call the attention of the gentleman from Illinois to this peculiar condition.

Mr. SPRINGER. If the gentleman desires me to answer him, I will say that I did not make that statement.

Mr. DINGLEY. What statement?

Mr. SPRINGER. The statement attributed to me by the gentleman, that the House would not pass a free-coinage bill. I did not make that statement.

Mr. DINGLEY. I understand it is so reported.

Mr. SPRINGER. It is a mistake.

Mr. DINGLEY. Will the gentleman please inform us in my time what it was he did say?

Mr. SPRINGER. My speech was somewhat lengthy, but I will state briefly that I said that in my opinion a free-coinage bill would not become a law during this Congress.

Mr. WISE. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WISE. Is this debate in order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. WISE. I object to its continuance.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks this debate is all out of order, but no point was made by any gentleman.

Mr. DINGLEY. Undoubtedly the whole political debate that has arisen here is out of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that debate must be confined to matters before the House. This is not in Committee of the Whole, where there is that general latitude of debate which we are all accustomed to in the committee; but this is the consideration of a matter in the House under the five-minute rule and these pro forma amendments and debate not directed to the measure itself or to an amendment is not in order, and the Chair will so hold. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk continued the reading. Having read as follows:

50. The enrollment of engrossed bills: to the Joint Committee on Enrolled Bills:

Mr. BOWERS said: Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. I always like to be in the fashion, and if there is anything going on I want to do my part. I propose right now to squander the five minutes that are allotted to me. [Laughter.] In the mean time, gentlemen, go right on with your business, and do not let me disturb you, as I am only going to squander the time. In that five minutes I will not have an opportunity to tell all I do not know about the silver question or all I do not know about the tariff. To do that, in all probability I would require as much time as any gentleman in the House who has made the attempt during the discussion of the rules. [Laughter.] Nor have I time to make a stump speech. That seems to be the approved method of discussing the rules; but if you will pardon me I will get out of the beaten track, and talk about the rules themselves for a few moments; and for fear I may not get the chance to-morrow I will take up the rule that I want to talk about. I suppose that will be as pertinent to the matter as the tariff discussion or any other discussion which has been had here this morning.

Section 3 of Rule XXI is an imputation upon the honesty, upon the integrity, and upon the common sense of every member of this House who is not a member of an appropriation committee. More than that, it is a libel upon the intelligence of this House. We come together, we choose one man to appoint a committee, he appoints a committee and puts our friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] in charge of it, and right there we stop. We then resolve and publicly acknowledge that that is about as far as we can trust ourselves; that individually we are honest, but collectively we are rascals. I was pleased to hear the representative of the People's party, or the third party [Mr. WATSON], demanding equal rights for all the people. I am with him there, and I go beyond him.

I demand, Mr. Speaker, equal rights on this floor for that great mass of human beings generally known as Democrats and Republicans, probably not entitled to the appellation of the "people;" but the fact is that that class of human beings largely predominate where I live, and I have got to cater to them and I want a chance to represent them on this floor.

It has been charged, Mr. Speaker, that this body in times past was not a deliberative body. If we adopt this rule, there is no question of doubt left that it is not a representative body, and that three hundred of its members might as well take a recess and go home until the Committee on Appropriations are ready to report, and then come in here and vote and go home again. Now, all my life I have heard my friends of the Democratic party crying out against the centralization of power.

But every step you have taken in these rules has been in the direction of centralizing power in the hands of one man or two or three men. That is the logical conclusion. That is what all these rules say. As one member of this House I claim that every member should have the opportunity to represent his section upon this floor, and if the House believes, when a committee bring in a bill that the committee have not done justice, this House should be allowed to do the right thing.

Why, suppose, Mr. Speaker, there comes an emergency in which it is necessary to make an appropriation to provide means to carry on something that is needed by the Government and by the people for the honor and the prosperity of this nation. We put ourselves in a position where we can not do it. Why, the rule is stupid.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BOWERS. I always obey the call of "time." [Laughter.]

The Clerk read as follows:

It shall always be in order to call up for consideration a report from the Committee on Rules, and pending the consideration the Speaker may entertain one motion that the House adjourn; but after the result is announced, he shall not entertain any other dilatory motion until the said report shall have been fully disposed of. Any commission authorized by law to report by bill to the House shall have leave to report such bill at any time, and may call the same up for consideration as provided in the fifth clause of Rule XXIV.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. I move to strike out the amendment.

The SPEAKER. What amendment? There is no amendment pending.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. The amendment reported by the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. They have not reported any amendment. This is the report of the committee.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. I move to strike out the words—

It shall always be in order to call up for consideration a report from the Committee on Rules, and pending the consideration the Speaker may entertain one motion that the House adjourn; but after the result is announced, he shall not entertain any other dilatory motion until the said report shall have been fully disposed of.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, as I understand, this provision which is offered by the Committee on Rules is not incorporated in the rules of the Fiftieth Congress. I move to strike it out, Mr. Speaker, not because I have any want of faith in the personnel of the Committee on Rules as it is now constituted either on the Democratic side, I may say, or on the Republican side, but I make it because of the fact that it proposes to keep alive in the rules of this House that rule which existed in the last House of Congress, under which so much of outrage upon the rights of members was committed by arbitrary rulings of the Speaker.

It proposes to give the Committee on Rules the right to be heard at any time. Sir, what is the Committee on Rules, and what ought it to be? Its name designates its character and the subject-matter that is confided to it by the House. When the Committee on Rules has prepared a set of rules for the government of the House, and they have been discussed and adopted by the House, then, sir, in my judgment the Committee on Rules, whether it be composed of five men or any other number, ought to be considered as functus officio, because it will have discharged its duties. I hope we shall not have the same scenes enacted in this House, the scenes that were so often repeated in the last House, when the Committee on Rules could come in at any time during the session and vary the rules by special rule; when they could come in and present any matter for consideration, adopt a rule for its consideration which should limit or restrict debate and cut off amendment. I had occasion to refer the other day to the time when the Committee on Rules in the consideration of a great tax bill, the McKinley tariff bill, came in here in the midst of the discussion and by an arbitrary rule required that so many pages of that bill should be read without debate and without amendment.

Now, sir, I am not willing to trust any Committee on Rules, however constituted, in any House, with this extraordinary power. What further does it propose, Mr. Speaker? It proposes to keep alive, I say, that rule in the last Congress which gave rise to much injustice, to be found in the words which say that—

Whenever there shall have been one motion to adjourn, and after the result is announced, he—shall not entertain any other dilatory motion until said report shall have been fully disposed of.

That gives to the Speaker of this House, as we are now constituted, the same power which was exercised by the Speaker of the last House, to determine what is a dilatory motion. While I have no doubt that that power could be confided to the honorable and fair-minded Speaker who now presides in the chair, as well as to any other member in this House, yet I say I would confide it to no man. He may think that a motion is a dilatory motion and under this rule cut it off.

The personal judgment of a single member of this House or the judgment of all the other men combined against it can not prevent the Speaker so ruling, and there is no recourse against that except by appeal, and the House is always reluctant to overrule the Speaker. Now, this rule clothes the Committee on Rules with all the power that was exercised in the last Congress to defeat discussion, to deny amendment, and to arbitrarily require that this House should at a certain time pass upon and vote upon any measure they saw fit. I say more, that this amendment which the majority of the Committee on Rules proposes will clothe the Speaker with a power which in my judgment he ought not to have.

Mr. CHIPMAN. I move that the gentleman from Mississippi be allowed to proceed for five minutes longer.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Mississippi be allowed to proceed five minutes longer. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. We witnessed, sir, another case where a special rule was passed by the Committee on Rules in the last Congress. A bill had been introduced, and reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, for the purpose of changing the whole judicial system of the United States. It was a very grave bill; it was a very important bill. It proposed to create an intermediary court of appeals between the original court and the Supreme Court.

It proposed to change the whole judicial system of the United States, and increase the number of judges, I believe, some twelve or fifteen, and yet, by the power with which, under the rules of the Fifty-first Congress, the Committee on Rules were invested, they were enabled to come into this Chamber when that grave measure was under consideration and limit debate to an hour and a half. Now, sir, I am unwilling to concede this power to the Committee on Rules. I do not think such a power ought to be confided to them. As I have already said, when the Committee on Rules have brought in their report and the rules have been discussed, amended, and adopted, the business of that committee has been accomplished.

If it can come in here at any moment with a peremptory order and limit debate and call up one particular subject rather than another, then it can interfere, in that way at least, with the consideration of the subject-matter that may then be before the House under the regular operation of the rules. It may be said that the House has a right to vote down such a proposition. That is true, sir; but we saw in the last Congress that the majority then in power followed the report of the Committee on Rules in every such instance. May you not witness the same thing again? May you not see measures brought forward here which the five members of the Committee on Rules may think ought to have consideration above and beyond all other measures?

You may have such questions brought forward to the displacement of matters regularly before the House, and you may, perhaps, witness the exercise of the same power that was exercised in the last Congress, and the affirmance of it by the Democratic party, which is now in power here by so large a majority. Then, sir, again, the Speaker of the House will oftentimes be asked to pass on the question of what constitutes a dilatory motion. A member may make an honest motion to adjourn, and we may see a repetition of the scenes of the last Congress when that motion which, in almost all parliamentary bodies, is regarded as always in order, was repeatedly ruled to be dilatory. I am unwilling to see any rule adopted which will cripple the power of the House or put it in the power of any committee to do that. We want this House of Representatives, coming immediately from the people and speaking for the people, to be in deed and in truth a deliberative body.

It can never be so as long as one committee has the power to prescribe the subject-matter which shall be considered by the House and the length of time it shall be debated and the right to arbitrarily fix the hour at which a vote shall be taken. I would not like to see the Speaker of a Democratic House invested with the troublesome function of determining what constitutes a dilatory motion. I would not like to see any rule adopted so similar to that which existed in the last House of Representatives and exercised, as in my judgment it was on many occasions exercised in that House, to defeat discussion, to deny the right to debate, to deny the right to deliberation, and to force a vote before the House was prepared for it by discussion. Sir, under the operation of the rule which is so familiar here of calling the previous question, we oftentimes see discussion denied, and not only discussion, but amendment. We saw an illustration of that the other day when my honorable friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] introduced his resolution, which afterwards he would have been glad to amend, but his own call for the previous question had tied his hands as well as the hands of every other member of the House.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the motion of the gentleman from Mississippi. I believe the rule as reported by the Committee on Rules should be adopted. There will be no embarrassment on the part of the Speaker in deciding the questions that may be involved in this rule. The same matter is already in the rules, was in the rules of the Fiftieth Congress, and has been in the rules of this House ever since I have been a member. I believe the rule I refer to was instituted in the Forty-second Congress. I read paragraph 8 of Rule XVI:

> Pending a motion to suspend the rules, the Speaker may entertain one motion that the House adjourn, but after the result thereon is announced, he shall not entertain any other dilatory motion until the vote is taken on suspension.

That, I believe, has been the rule of this House for twenty years.

Mr. REED. Which rule?

Mr. SPRINGER. The one I have just read.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Will the gentleman from Illinois permit me to ask him whether there are not two very marked differences between that and the rule under consideration—first that the suspension of the rules requires a two-thirds vote, and second that the power is there limited to certain days?

Mr. SPRINGER. I will consider that presently.

Mr. REED. I suggest to the gentleman from Illinois that what he has read is what was left over from the "tyranny" of the last Republican Congress but one, and that it is not a rule of twenty years' existence.

Mr. SPRINGER. Well, I have never heard any complaint from any source as to the operation of that rule since it was instituted.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. The gentleman from Illinois, I understand, has been reading from the rules of the Forty-second Congress.

Mr. SPRINGER. Yes, and of all subsequent Congresses.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. Well, you read from the rules of the Forty-second Congress.

Mr. SPRINGER. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. That was a proposition to suspend all rules, while this is a proposition simply to make a rule. That is the difference between the two cases.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman need not have taken up my time to make that statement. I read the proposition. It is, "Pending a motion to suspend the rules," which, as we all know, requires a two-thirds vote. Upon that proposition the rule provided that the Speaker could entertain one motion to adjourn, and thereafter no other dilatory motion could be entertained. So that the practice upon this subject has been well known during all these years.

Mr. OATES. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. SPRINGER. Yes, sir.

Mr. OATES. Suppose a report from the Committee on Rules is under consideration, one motion to adjourn has been made, and the consideration of the report has not been finished, but night comes on and the House desires to adjourn until another day, how can you do it?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Such a motion to adjourn would not be a dilatory motion.

Mr. SPRINGER. I have never seen a time when the House did not adjourn when it wanted to adjourn. The embarrassment suggested by the gentleman from Alabama has never arisen in twenty years' operation of this rule.

Now, as to what would be a dilatory motion after one motion to adjourn has been disposed of, that is a question for the Speaker to determine, and, as I have said, no difficulty upon that point has ever occurred during the twenty years that the rule has been in operation. The only difference between the pending proposition in the rules as reported and the motion to suspend the rules mentioned here is that it requires a two-thirds vote to suspend the rules, while under the pending rule only a majority vote is required. Now, Mr. Speaker, suppose we do not adopt the rule recommended by the Committee on Rules, where does that leave us? The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] says he will not agree that any committee shall have power to fix a time when a vote shall be taken on any measure. Where shall that power be placed then? The gentleman from Mississippi, upon his plan, can, on his own responsibility, prevent this House from coming to a vote on any question at any time during the rest of the session. Now, are we to say in this House that one man can prevent any legislation? We are to respect the rights of the minority, to be sure, but are we to regard one man on this floor as of so much importance that he can set himself up as a minority, which shall have the power to prevent the rest of the House from acting, so that nothing can be done except by his permission?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Arkansas. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois be allowed to proceed for five minutes more.

Mr. PICKLER. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. PICKLER. I hope his time will be extended.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to allowing the gentleman from Illinois to continue his remarks for five minutes longer?

There was no objection.

Mr. SPRINGER. Now, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. PICKLER. Before the gentleman resumes I would like to ask him one question. Following up the idea suggested by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES], I wish to ask this question: Under the operation of this rule, after there has been one motion to adjourn, then, even though a majority of the House should desire to adjourn, if some one member wants the consideration of the question continued and settled before an adjournment, will not the House be at the mercy of his objection?

Mr. SPRINGER. The Speaker would then have the right to determine whether any other dilatory motion should be entertained. We have operated under a rule of this kind for twenty years, and within my recollection not a single objection has ever been brought up against the rule on that ground.

Mr. PICKLER. But as the rule expressly allows only one motion to adjourn, would not the Speaker be restricted from entertaining any other motion of that kind?

Mr. SPRINGER. I have answered that question, and I do not desire to be interrupted further on that point. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama for a suggestion.

Mr. OATES. The answer to the gentleman from Illinois, it seems to me, is that after there has been one motion to adjourn, no other motion to adjourn can be made if the Speaker should hold the motion to be dilatory. Thus the entire power is transferred into the hands of the Speaker to determine whether the House can adjourn or not.

Mr. SPRINGER. My answer to the gentleman is that during twenty years of experience under a rule of this kind such a difficulty as is suggested has never arisen within my knowledge on a motion to suspend the rules; and I do not anticipate that any such difficulty will arise hereafter. I have never yet known a time when the House, if it desired to adjourn, was not able to do so.

Mr. BUCHANAN of New Jersey. Will the gentleman from Illinois allow me——

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman must excuse me. I would like to say something about this rule.

Mr. BUCHANAN of New Jersey. My suggestion had reference to this very point; but if the gentleman does not wish to yield, I will not press it.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, I have had some experience in this House in what is known as filibustering. [Laughter.] I have seen it practiced when, as the gentleman from Maine said, the minority was not a political minority; and it frequently happens in our deliberations—and, in fact, it is generally the rule—that the minority which is developed is not a political minority. We are here to do business for our constituents.

Mr. BUCHANAN of New Jersey. That is what we say.

Mr. SPRINGER. That it is our duty thus to do business no one will doubt or question. I have the greatest respect for a minority that approaches numerically one-half of this body; but it is not right that the wheels of legislation should be stopped at the behest of one member of the House, however important he may be, or however important his constituents may be. I have seen the time when one member has prevented business from being transacted in this House for days. I do not want to see that scene repeated. I believe our constituents expect us to do something during this session, without our being put under the necessity of obtaining unanimous consent to do it.

This proposition is eminently fair. It will not be oppressive upon any minority, political or otherwise, in this body. It will give all interests an opportunity to be heard, as I believe every gentleman on this floor will concede that the Speaker and the Committee on Rules of this House will allow to the various measures that may come before this body that careful consideration which their importance may require, and will not try to prevent the reasonable discussion or thoughtful consideration of any proper measure. I have the utmost confidence in the Committee on Rules; and as we must leave this authority to some committee I am perfectly satisfied to leave this power where the report of the Committee on Rules has placed it, and where some rule should place it if we expect to do business for our constituents.

Mr. SIMPSON rose.

Mr. SPRINGER. I yield a moment to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SIMPSON].

Mr. SIMPSON. Was it not under the plea of dispatching business that the gentleman who occupied the chair in the last Congress strangled a minority?

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED], who occupied the chair at that time, is here now, and I would prefer that he answer the gentleman's question. [Laughter.]

Mr. SIMPSON. I wish to ask the gentleman from Illinois if it does not have the same effect to place the power in the hands of three members as it does to put it into the hands of a Speaker? Is there not the same power to strangle a minority?

Mr. SPRINGER. It does not, sir. I can answer that question very readily. It is a very different power from that given to the Speaker of the last House, who of his own volition could decide every question.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. And under a rule and on an argument similar to that just made by yourself, a rule of this House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that it is the rule of all parliamentary bodies for members to be silent when not recognized. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, ordinarily I should be content to accept any code of rules which the committee might frame to regulate the proceedings of this body. But the rule now under consideration seems to me to involve such an essential departure from the traditions and the usages of the Democratic party that I am unwilling to see it become the law of this House except over my respectful protest.

One of the profoundest thinkers of this age, in one of the most admirable little books of any age, observes the singular but obvious fact that the American people to-day are living under a system of government unknown to their Constitution—a government by committees. The people elect us; we elect a Speaker, and he appoints the committees to which this House has parceled out its authority, until you know that our chiefest work is wrought out, not in this Hall, but in the various committee rooms.

Probably it is true that the evil is to a great extent a necessary one. But it appears to me that this rule aggravates it unwarrantably. This rule appears to me to approach the dangerous extreme of constituting a majority of the Committee on Rules a legislative triumvirate whose permission we must consult in almost every affirmative action we take.

Sir, in all of the vast machinery of the Federal Government, from the President of the United States down through his Cabinet, through the Senate, through the Supreme Court, through the inferior tribunals, and among all its more than hundred thousand officers and employés, the three hundred and thirty-two men who sit in this Hall are the only ones who take their commissions and derive their powers directly and immediately from the people themselves. I believe that a power so acquired ought not to be delegated except in the case of absolute and pressing necessity.

But, Mr. Speaker, I am told that I ought not to complain against this radical innovation. I am told that it is necessary to suppress the filibustering, which some people declare has become a common scandal on Congress. I am told that in order to expedite the public business it has become necessary to lodge an extraordinary power somewhere.

Is that true, Mr. Speaker? Is that a correct statement of the facts? No, sir. If it is, why is it necessary? They tell me it is necessary to enable the majority of the House, who are responsible for legislation, to execute its policies and write its convictions in the statute books.

Sir, the party having a majority here and therefore answerable to the country for the conduct of its business is under no such necessity. It is provided with a legitimate and an immemorial safeguard against obstruction; because we have a majority of two-thirds, and with it we may safely and properly suspend all rules and make any order or pass any bill our judgment may demand.

[Here the hammer fell].

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. I hope the gentleman will be permitted to proceed.

Mr. COX of Tennessee. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Texas be permitted to continue his remarks for five minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DOCKERY in the chair). Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BAILEY. But, sir, waiving all contention over that point, and supposing for the sake of argument that the House must invent some new method to facilitate its progress, I ask you to examine for a moment and see how far this rule is calculated to accomplish this purpose. Is it a rule that suppresses all filibustering, or is it one of those flexible arrangements which permits or prevents it according to the arbitrary will of a committee?

To illustrate my meaning, Mr. Speaker, let us suppose two examples. Suppose that the Committee on Agriculture of this House has favorably reported a bill taxing compound lard. Let us suppose it is known that a majority of this House favors the bill and will vote for its passage. Now, sir, if your Committee on Rules is adverse to the bill, the gentleman from Missouri, the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, will appeal in vain for an order fixing a day when the bill shall be taken up, when the debate shall be closed, and a vote be taken upon it. But, sir, under the late ruling the gentleman and his bill will be handed over to the mercy of the filibusterers.

On the other hand, let us suppose the great city of Chicago is ready for its raid on the public Treasury, and the Committee on the World's Columbian Exposition has reported favorably a bill to take five millions of dollars of the people's money and give it to an Illinois corporation, and suppose the Committee on Rules should be favorable to the proposition, what would be the result? Why, sir, they would report an order to this House fixing that at a certain hour of a certain day the House must consummate that work.

Thus, Mr. Speaker, in these two examples we witness the result. I have selected them at random and without the slightest reference to my own position on them, because I am equally opposed to each of them; but they demonstrate the fallacy. They show how this same committee, acting under the same rules, under the same conditions, may arrive at precisely opposite results. The bill which is fortunate enough to find their favor they force to a passage, and that which falls under their condemnation they suffer to be stricken down with the rankest delays imaginable.

Sir, if you adopt this rule, you are estopped hereafter to criticise the Fifty-first Congress and the distinguished gentleman who presided over its deliberations. [Applause on the Republican side.] It embodies the very essence of his philosophy in transacting the public business. That Congress proposed to suppress filibustering—how? By authorizing its presiding officer to decline entertaining a dilatory motion; and this Congress is asked to bestow practically the same power upon a committee that may be controlled by two men. If we consent, Mr. Speaker, we merely change our masters and not our task. If a change must be inaugurated, and the parliamentary practice of one hundred years must be amended, and the Representatives of the people must surrender their power, it becomes our duty to provide with all possible care against its perversion and misuse.

If this House is no longer competent to exercise its ancient privileges, to whom shall we yield them? To the Speaker or to a committee; or is it not possible to fix a limitation in the rules themselves which shall secure us alike against obstruction and against tyranny? As between the Speaker and the committee, it is an open question in my mind if it were not better to confer this enormous power on the Speaker alone than on a committee which he creates. He is the organ of this House, selected by its voice, and from his high place he must deliver his decision in the presence of his colleagues and before his countrymen. The committee is subject to no such limitation. It is one degree removed farther from the people, the source of all power. It is not chosen by the House. It holds its sessions and reaches its determinations in secret, and it is therefore more strongly tempted to do wrong and its incentive to do right is weaker.

Mr. MCKENNA. Mr. Speaker, I rise for the purpose of presenting to the House Democratic testimonials, including one from the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER], to the baleful and pernicious tendency and effect of the provision under consideration. It was said by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] that the control of this House must be put either in the majority or in the minority; and I said a few days ago that I believed that it may be the legislative right and duty of the majority to provide for its control. This is the Republican view. It was not the Democratic view in the last Congress, and I wish to display in clear relief and light its change of sentiment, the accurate opposition of its position now to its position then, and to show with emphasis that the noise it made then was the assumption and convenience of the occasion, the putting on of the livery of heaven to serve the party in.

The rule of the Fifty-first Congress, the Republican rule, was, "That the Speaker should entertain no dilatory motion." The rule as proposed in this Congress, the Democratic view, is that pending the consideration of the report of the Committee on Rules the Speaker shall entertain one motion to adjourn, and shall entertain no other dilatory motion until the matter of the report be fully disposed of. Mr. Speaker, the power invested in the Speaker is identical in both rules, as beneficent or as pernicious. There is nothing in either to guide him to wisdom or to justice. Power is intrusted to his virtue or his vice, to use or to abuse. This was declared by the Democratic party to be too great and unguarded a power to trust to any man, that no virtue should receive it or can endure it. Mr. Speaker, whatever may be the self-satisfaction and complacency of that party, the rest of the world will not believe that its human nature will resist a temptation that human nature elsewhere would yield to.

Mr. OATES. Will the gentleman from California allow me just one question?

Mr. MCKENNA. Certainly, but I have only a little time.

Mr. OATES. Does the gentleman know of any member of this House belonging to his party who will vote against that proposition?

Mr. MCKENNA. I do not know that "the gentleman" does, because there has been given ridiculous and bombastic importance to the whole business. In my judgment the power to distinguish between motions and their purport is a wretchedly commonplace one, and I believe that if temptation comes to the Speaker to abuse his power, it will not be the abuse of the power invested in him by the rule under consideration.

But as to the testimonials. The rule of the Fifty-first Congress, "That no dilatory motion should be entertained by the Speaker," being under consideration, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] addressed admonition to the House. He was distinguished in the last Congress; he is distinguished in this. He was an oracle of his party then as he is now. He declared then not a temporary policy but a permanent policy. He certainly did not intend to assert that a power dangerous to be intrusted to the Republican party could be intrusted to the Democratic party.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from California be allowed to proceed for ten minutes longer.

The SPEAKER. Unanimous consent is asked that the gentleman from California be allowed to proceed for ten minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MCKENNA. Mr. HOLMAN said—

> Under this rule the Speaker is simply master. I do not think any Speaker should desire such power. It is a power he should shrink from.

Has anything been suggested to the virtue of the gentleman from Indiana that has softened him and made him now think that it is a proper power to give to the Speaker? [Laughter on the Republican side.]

What said the distinguished gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY], Mr. Speaker? He also is a leader of his party, eminent in its councils; sometimes he is called to the chair, and is deemed to know its impulses and responsibilities and temptations. What said he?

> That no just and impartial Speaker should be clothed with the authority of this rule, much less should he seek its irresponsible powers.

Mr. Speaker, has the gentleman from Missouri changed? [Laughter, Mr. DOCKERY being in the chair.] Still another distinguished gentleman and Democrat, "one of the acknowledged strongest," to use the words of Carlyle, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MCCREARY], whom I see before me. What said he?

> I assert here, and I defy contradiction, that no free representative body in the world has ever intrusted a presiding officer with such unrestricted, such unprecedented power as that rule intrusts to the present Speaker of the House.

Have you changed, sir?

And the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] addressed counsel and admonition to the House and the country. It is not necessary for me to dwell upon the importance of the utterances of the gentleman from Illinois. He is the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, a position only less eminent than that of the Speaker. Besides, he is a deliberate man, and talks—presumably talks—deliberately and wisely. He knows the value of words, and uses them with accurate and precise adaptation to the meaning they ought to convey. He has been quoted as saying, in another place, with striking aphorism, "There is nothing so valuable as talk." He knows, then, the value of words—he certainly put none in currency which he did not intend to last for all time—to express permanent not transient truth. What said he in denunciation of the rule of the Fifty-first Congress forbidding the Speaker to entertain dilatory motions? You have heard what he said to-day, what said he then?

> I submit it is the most arbitrary power ever given to one man. * * * The Speaker is supposed to be the servant of the House; this makes him the master of the House. * * * It converts the body into a one-man power. * * * I protest against it as unparliamentary, as contrary to the character of a representative of the people, and as long as I have a place in this body I shall continue to protest. I shall not be required to submit every motion to the Speaker before I make it to the House.

The RECORD says, "Applause on the Democratic side." [Laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, I hope you will not call for the gentleman's resignation. [Laughter.]

What said another distinguished Democrat, eminent in the counsels of the party, and deserving to be eminent from merit and service? What said my friend Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky? He said:

> The power granted to the Speaker to decide what motions are dilatory and to refuse to entertain them is a most dangerous and ungracious power. He must be a singularly pure, passionless, and impartial character who can occupy the Speaker's chair in this House and so conduct himself in that great office with this added and unprecedented power as to preserve the confidence and esteem of the House. * * *

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the time of the gentleman from California be extended five minutes.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. That seems to be a very good speech the gentleman is reading from, and I hope that the House will allow him to proceed.

Mr. MCKENNA. It was indeed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from California be extended. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. MCKENNA. The gentleman from Kentucky is right, it was indeed a good speech, eloquently delivered. Does he stand by it to-day? [Laughter.]

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. By every word of it.

Mr. MCKENNA. I am glad you do.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. I expect to vote on these rules in accordance with the sentiments therein expressed.

Mr. MCKENNA. You are the only gentleman so far who has risen to the floor and declared his adhesion in this Congress to the sentiments that he expressed in the last Congress on this subject. [Laughter.] Republicans are more consistent. If they made rules to enable the majority to control in the Fifty-first Congress they are willing that the Democrats shall make rules for the majority to control in this Congress. Mr. REED has frankly declared it. His party approves it. [Applause.] But the gentleman from Kentucky interrupted me before I had completed what he said. He further said:

I doubt whether there is a living man who can exercise the power granted by that rule during one term of this Congress without disastrous consequences to his reputation and without danger of frequent anger and perhaps permanent estrangements between Representatives on the floor.

Mr. Speaker, these were the utterances of the Democratic party in the Fifty-first Congress, and in view of them their attitude now takes on something of the funny—it might be described as absolutely farcical. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. CHIPMAN. Mr. Speaker, no man on this floor entertains higher respect for the members who compose the Committee on Rules than I do; but the particular rule under discussion seems to me to embody the very evil against which we protested so strongly in the last Congress, and our mildest epithet for which, if I remember aright, was to characterize it as "czarism." We regarded it as a great oppression. We so announced not only on the floor of this House, in language of the most unsparing severity, but we went before our constituents during the campaign and complained of it as a great offense against popular government committed by the then dominant party.

I, Mr. Speaker, was in earnest. On my part, at least, it was no mere cry for the purpose of carrying an election; but it was a determined and solemn conviction that by that course of conduct the then majority in the House assailed the liberty of the people through their Representatives. I understand, Mr. Speaker, that this is to be an economical Congress. I beg gentlemen, while they are zealous in saving the money of the people, not to be prodigal of the rights of the people represented here. [Applause.]

After all, sir, the Constitution must be our guide in this matter, and, in my judgment, properly administered on a point of order, not only this but other clauses in the rules now under consideration would be held a violation of that sacred instrument. I will say further that in my experience the possession of the Committee on Rules by the party in power in the House is a fatal gift. It certainly has been so in every Congress of which I have been a member. In the Fiftieth Congress, with all respect to the gentlemen who then composed the committee, it led the Democratic party to defeat. In the Fifty-first Congress it certainly, under the leadership of the Speaker of that Congress, led the Republican party to the most overwhelming defeat in its history.

The difficulty about that committee is the smallness of its membership. It is not accessible to popular sentiment. It is necessarily apart from touch with the feeling of the House, and the result is that while it may act, as it thinks, wisely and, I have no doubt patriotically, instead of being an aid to the procedure of the House, instead of sending members home with their local wants satisfied, it stands as a curb and impediment; it harnesses, as it were, in a strait-jacket the majority of the members upon this floor and deprives them as individual Representatives of free action. Sir, this is not constitutional, parliamentary government, this government by a committee——

On motion of Mr. BUSHNELL, unanimous consent was given that Mr. CHIPMAN might proceed for five minutes longer.

Mr. CHIPMAN. Mr. Speaker, under the Constitution as I conceive it you may fix limitations upon the power of your committees, but you can not fix limitations upon the power of a member of this House. His power is in the expression of the right of his constituents to be represented. It is guarantied to the people as necessary to their good government; and while committees, as mere organs of the House, as mere agents of the House, may be restricted in their work, the member of the House is subject to no restriction, is capable of no restriction short of that perfect freedom of action and of debate which the Constitution of the United States intends that a representative of the people shall have.

The adoption of this rule, then, is the indorsement of a bad precedent. It is assuming the wickedest, the worst, of all the wicked things done in the last Congress as our example in this; and I, for one, should return to my constituents shamefaced if I was obliged to point to that rule, an almost absolute repetition of the rule of the majority in the last House, as having been adopted here with my assent. Sir, there can be no free Congress unless there is debate. There can not be a free government under the control of committees. There can not be a strict observance of all the rights of the people unless each and every man upon this floor speaks and votes his full mind upon every question which is brought before us. [Applause.]

Mr. GOODNIGHT was recognized.

Mr. OATES. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. OATES. Is the proposition now pending subject to amendment? I will ask the Chair how many amendments are pending?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There is only one amendment pending. The proposition is subject to amendment. The Chair is advised, however, that the pending motion is to strike this paragraph from the report.

Mr. OATES. After the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. GOODNIGHT], who has been recognized, gets through I will ask to be recognized for the purpose of offering a substitute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Of course the gentleman from Alabama understands that an amendment to the text will take precedence over a motion to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. But still it will not displace the motion to strike out.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Not at all.

Mr. GOODNIGHT. I am persuaded, Mr. Speaker, that the differences of opinion expressed, at least on this side of the House, arise from a misapprehension of this rule as reported. If the proposition were to vest greater power in one man, or in a set of men, such proposition would find no more earnest opponent than myself. But that is not the proposition. Nobody on this side contends that the Speaker's power with reference to any ordinary measure, or indeed upon any legislation, should be enlarged. This rule as reported does not propose to take any power whatever from the House. No single instance can be mentioned in which it would or could have that effect. The whole question, Mr. Speaker, is as the vibrating of a pendulum from one extreme to the other, and this is the attempted solution. This is an effort to rest the pendulum at a normal midway position.

For a long period in the proceedings of this body power was vested in one man on the floor as the filibusterer; in the last Congress it was vested largely in one man in the chair as the Speaker. Here is the compromise—not to vest power in the Speaker, one man; not to vest it in the filibusterer, one man; not to vest it in the Committee on Rules, a set of men; but to vest it in the House, by authorizing the Committee on Rules to ask the House whether it is its desire to proceed with business and its desire that the filibuster be stopped.

Several MEMBERS. That is so.

Mr. GOODNIGHT. The Committee on Rules can make their report to this House; nothing more. It has been assumed that when the report is made all discussion must stop, and that the measure to which the report refers must be voted upon. That does not follow at all. That is not the position the House would occupy. The only question raised when the Committee on Rules reports to this House would be, will the House sustain the Committee on Rules in its report and take up the measure as suggested by the committee? If the House does not want to take it up at that time, but wishes to indulge further debate or further delay, then all the House has to do is to say, "We do not adopt the report of the Committee on Rules, but will proceed with the debate or allow delay." The House having voted down the report, the filibuster proceeds, or the debate proceeds, as the case may be. That is the whole case.

But, says my amiable friend from Texas, suppose the appropriate committee should report favorably a lard bill, and suppose the Committee on Rules should not favor that measure and should refuse to bring in a report fixing a time for its consideration, what would then be our attitude? I will answer the gentleman by saying that his attitude would then be just what it would be if the report of the Committee on Rules in favor of fixing a time for the consideration of his measure should not be adopted, and just the same as it must remain if this clause of the rule be not adopted. The measure would be left to the operation of the old rules which have prevailed here for probably a hundred years, and would be the subject of indefinite and insuperable delay, just as other measures have been.

This proposed rule, I repeat, does not, as I apprehend, vest any enlarged power in the Speaker. It simply places this matter upon the same ground as a motion to suspend the rules was placed by the rules of the Fiftieth Congress and previous Congresses. The language of the rule on that subject is exactly the same as in the rule now reported:

Pending a motion to suspend the rules the Speaker may entertain one motion that the House adjourn—

I read from the old rule, section 8, Rule XVI—

but after the result thereon is announced he shall not entertain any other dilatory motion till a vote be taken on suspension.

This is almost exactly the language of the rule proposed, viz:

It shall always be in order to call up for consideration a report from the Committee on Rules, and pending the consideration the Speaker may entertain one motion that the House adjourn; but after the result is announced he shall not entertain any other dilatory motion until the said report shall have been fully disposed of.

If the proposed rule is adopted, and the Committee on Rules should make a report fixing the time for a vote upon a bill or measure during the consideration of the special report so fixing a time, the Speaker is not to entertain any dilatory motion except one motion to adjourn until action shall be taken on the report of the Committee on Rules; not on the bill to which the report refers, not on the measure which the House desires to discuss, but simply on the report of the committee. When you have taken a vote on the report of the committee, if that report is voted down, then everything proceeds as if no report had been made. But if, on a vote, the report of the committee be sustained, then the time for the consideration of the measure is fixed. It creates no despotism, abridges no right of the House, but, on the contrary, enlarges the power of the House.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. The gentleman will allow me to say——

Mr. GOODNIGHT. If I may——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. GOODNIGHT] has expired.

Mr. BOATNER. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman who has just taken his seat has so admirably stated the difference between this rule and the rule by which the last House was governed that I hardly feel able to state it more strongly. I wish, however, to emphasize this salient difference between the two rules. Under the rules of the Fifty-first Congress the power to tyrannize the House was lodged with the Speaker; under this rule the power to control the House is left with the majority of the body. It is left in the power of the majority of the House by the report of one of its committees, regularly brought before it and subject to debate, to assert its will upon any matter of legislation. Upon this report the House may vote as it chooses.

Mr. Speaker, this point of difference is signalized and emphasized by the instance to which I beg leave to call attention. During the last session, as will be remembered, there was an important measure of legislation which the Republican party desired to enact. This side of the House considered that measure so unwise and contrary to sound principles of public policy that a filibuster against it was deemed justifiable. The Speaker of the House carried that bill by counting as present and constituting a quorum members who were not in this House. On the following day, when the question of the approval of the Journal came up, the then chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, the leader on the Republican side, took the floor and called the previous question on a motion to approve the Journal.

Against that motion the Speaker of the House held every other motion to be dilatory. He ruled that the only business before the House was the vote on the approval of the Journal, which must be taken at once; and the gentlemen who were not here, but who had been recorded as present and refusing to vote, were compelled to accept, as a matter of grace, the opportunity given them by the then chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means to state the fact that they were absent by rising to questions of personal privilege.

Now, I mention that as an instance in which the arbitrary power vested in the Speaker by that code of rules was used to shut off any debate upon a question of vital concern to the members of the House and to the country; that is, whether a bill reported as having been passed through the House was so passed with a constitional quorum present and participating in the proceedings.

I understand the question here to be whether we will protect ourselves against the tyranny of one man or against the tyranny of a majority. As I understand it, without this provision any man or a few men may absolutely prevent the transaction of any business.

I ask gentlemen if that is not more odious than the tyranny of a majority? If the distinguished gentleman from Missouri, the chairman of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, brings in a bill that we all expect, a bill providing for the free and unlimited coinage of silver, it is entirely practicable, in the absence of such a provision in the rule as that proposed, for the bill to be defeated, notwithstanding the fact that nine-tenths of this House, or of this side of the House, may favor it. With such a rule it would be a question with the House whether it would shut off dilatory motions and bring the bill to a direct vote of the members. That is the effect of the provision now incorporated in the rule.

If there is opposition to the bill, it develops itself in legitimate debate. If there is opposition to the bill which is purely factious, and it is sought to defeat it, not by legitimate means, but by filibustering, the rule permits the Committee on Rules to bring in a report fixing a time for a vote, which report itself is subject to debate, and after a proper time is given the question is called upon it, it is brought to a vote, and determined with the possibility of interposing but one dilatory motion.

I can not see how such power can be improperly used. The committee may not exercise it as often as some of us may wish or oftener than some of us wish; but certainly no harm can come from permitting the majority of this House to express its legislative will. The arbitrary power conferred upon the Speaker by the rules of the Fifty-first Congress, which we denounced in unmeasured terms, took away from the House itself the power to decide whether a motion was dilatory. If the Speaker so ruled, it was final. An appeal from the ruling was itself held to be dilatory, and if the House had desired to reverse that ruling it was powerless to do so. Under the proposed rule the Committee on Rules submits this very question to the House. If it desires to stop dilatory motions and proceed to a finality on the measure under consideration, it can do so. If, on the contrary, it does not, it can vote down the resolution.

Mr. DICKERSON. Let me ask the gentleman a question just there.

Mr. BOATNER. Certainly.

Mr. DICKERSON. What limitation is there on debate with reference to the adoption of the report of the Committee on Rules? How long a time may that be discussed?

Mr. BOATNER. I did not say that there is any limitation upon it. There is no such provision in the rule. I suppose it would be for the House to determine.

Mr. DICKERSON. Then how do you escape filibustering there?

Mr. BOATNER. It would not be possible, because the rule itself forbids more than one filibustering or dilatory motion.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of gentlemen who are declaiming against the threatened tyranny of the Committee on Rules to the fact that in seeking to relieve themselves of this tyranny, so called, they are subjecting themselves to the tyranny of possibly a single member of the House, who for motives, however proper or improper, would be able of himself, by the adoption of dilatory tactics, to defeat legislation altogether. For myself I prefer that the power, if this rule can have that effect, to defeat legislation, should be lodged in responsible and representative hands. I do not want to be at the mercy of an individual or a faction, who might by an abuse of these privileges under the rules balk useful and important legislation. The proposed rule does not confer undue power upon the Speaker. Action taken under it must be by the House itself; it takes away no right of the minority, and is not in my opinion subject to a single sound or reasonable objection.

Mr. ENLOE. Mr. Speaker, I think that the condition of this very large Democratic majority here may be aptly described by saying that it is "between the devil and the deep blue sea." Gentlemen are telling us here that the adoption of a code of rules is not a political question. But I want to say to gentlemen constituting the majority that it is the one political question that involves the determination of all others, and if there is necessity for unanimity of action upon the part of the majority of this House on any question whatever, it is important and necessary that they should act in harmony upon the adoption of a code of rules to govern the transaction of business here.

So far as this proposed rule is concerned I recognize the fact that the majority must take the responsibility; that the power to regulate legislation and determine that something, and what, shall be done, and which out of all of the important subjects presented shall be taken up and considered, must be vested somewhere, in somebody. I am not willing to vest it in any Speaker, nor would I vest it in the Committee on Rules, if we could have a committee on the order of business, selected by a Democratic caucus, to determine what measures should be brought before the House in preference to any and all other measures.

But, Mr. Speaker, if it comes down to the question as to whether we shall leave the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. WATSON], with his minority of 7, or the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED], with his minority of 87, to determine what this House shall or shall not do or to prevent it from doing any business at all, then I would vest the power in the Committee on Rules rather than leave it in the hands of an irresponsible minority. Ours is the responsible party. We were elected and sent here to do something. We were elected upon certain distinct pledges of reform; and if we come here and fail to adopt a code of rules by which we can take any step toward inaugurating those reforms, then our election will have been in vain, and the people of this country will hold us responsible for the failure.

Mr. BOUTELLE. That was the speech made by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] yesterday.

Mr. ENLOE. I want the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] to hear what I have to say, because I shall refer to his speech of yesterday. The rules of the Fiftieth Congress were rules under which it was not possible to do anything when there were a half dozen gentlemen who desired to prevent it.

I see something good in the rules of the Fifty-first Congress. [Applause on the Republican side.] Notwithstanding the source is evil, I am willing to take good when it comes, come from what quarter it may. [Laughter.] I want to take out of the rules of the Fifty-first Congress those things which are good and incorporate them into the rules of the Fifty-second. I believe in making progress and in profiting by the experience which we acquire here as members. While the rules of the Fiftieth Congress were do-nothing rules, the rules of the Fifty-first Congress went to the opposite extreme. That Congress did too much.

I noticed the eloquence with which the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] pleaded for the adoption of his code of rules in this House, and I must say that his moods are as variable as the weather in Washington. I have seen him when his brow looked like a thundercloud, when he scorned to do less than command, but yesterday it looked like a May morning, as he smilingly addressed himself to this Democratic majority and pleaded for the adoption of his parliamentary discoveries and inventions.

Mr. REED. Well, the Democratic majority at one time was behaving itself and at the other time was not. [Laughter.]

Mr. ENLOE. A Democratic majority always behaves itself. Now, Mr, Speaker, if the gentleman could persuade this House to adopt his code of rules and then could persuade the occupant of that chair to adopt his methods and his decisions, he could look forward with satisfaction to the day when he would be able to attend the political funeral of the great majority of the Democrats in this House, and I have no doubt he would attend it with pleasure.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ENLOE. I ask for a little further time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that his time be extended. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ENLOE. Now, Mr. Speaker, when I heard the gentleman boasting here yesterday, and reading the record of the legislative achievements of the Fifty-first Congress, I was astonished at his moderation. After he had gone through the category of its deeds he did not turn round and say—his modesty would not allow him to say—"It was I myself that did it;" but, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman no doubt forebore because he thought if he overcharged his remarks with too many facts there might be some danger in the recoil.

While he was going over that category and rejoicing in the evils inflicted on the American people and advising this majority what to do, it flashed through my mind that I myself occupy conquered territory in this House. [Mr. ENLOE sits on the Republican side.] I looked around here and I found that immediately at my right was where the gallant McKinley fell in that struggle, and a little farther down in front the fiery Cannon was silenced; and as I thought of his [Mr. REED'S] leadership and his achievements I thought of the charge of the Light Brigade at Balaklava. When I remembered how the gentleman and his party had charged over the minority in this House and had sabered the Representatives of the people who stood in the way of the accomplishment of his ends, how he went out of this House and led the charge against the citadel of the liberties of the people, I thought how like it was to the charge of the Light Brigade:

Cannon to right of them,
Cannon to left of them,
Cannon in front of them,
  Volleyed and thundered
Into the jaws of death,
Into the mouth of hell,
  Their leader had blundered.

Stormed at with shot and shell,
While horse and hero fell,
They that had fought so well,
  Came back from the jaws of death,
Back from the mouth of hell,
All that was left of them,
  Less than one hundred.

[Laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, I looked around yesterday when the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] was speaking of this legislation and asking for popular approval, and listened to hear if on this battlefield where so many fell I could hear a voice from those twenty-seven chairmen of committees and the host of members who followed his leadership to their death. I listened for some voice from that silent majority who occupied the chairs which we today occupy on this side of the line, and I heard no voice responding. Though a part of the dead were taken up by this Administration and buried in foreign missions and other Federal appointments, there are numbers of them whose unappeased ghosts still stalk the earth, and I thought if they could have been heard they would have said, "If we could only repent of our sins we never would be guilty again." [Laughter.] Though they could not respond to his challenge when he challenged public opinion on this legislation, a response came back from the people.

That answer is here in visible, various, and multitudinous form. The Speaker of this House himself is an answer to it. It commences on the right of his chair a solid Democratic phalanx, and comes around to the center aisle, and crossing, it stops at this dangerously narrow border line which separates me from the gentleman from Maine. It commences on the Speaker's left again and comes up to the first aisle, completely surrounding the gentleman and his party.

And now, Mr. Speaker, the once powerful gentleman from Maine, like a prisoner in the hands of the enemy, instead of commanding, pleads for what he desires. He makes an appeal here to the Democrats of this House to imitate his example that is almost pathetic. We have had enough of his system of parliamentary government, but, Mr. Speaker, I trust we shall discriminate between the good and the bad, and out of the two codes of rules under discussion construct rules under which we may be able to redeem our pledges to the people.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WASHINGTON. Mr. Speaker, in view of the explanation of the clause of this rule so clearly made by my friend from Kentucky [Mr. GOODNIGHT], I feel that there is but one other point that ought to be made clear to satisfy the minds of the majority that a rule by the majority to limit the right of debate is necessary under these rules. This House has grown to such enormous proportions, and the ingenuity of the filibuster has developed to such an acute extent, that some means must be devised in order to enable the majority here to express itself when that majority determines to act. Hence there is necessity for this clause in the rule.

In putting it there the Democratic majority attempts to and does avoid the great danger of lodging everything in the hands of one man by making the Speaker an autocrat or a czar. If the report of the Committee on Rules lodges that power in a committee of this House, it is amenable to the order of this House at all times.

The gentleman from Texas said that an occasion might arise in which the majority of the House wished for the passage of a measure when the Committee on Rules, or a majority of that committee, would be opposed to the passage of that measure, and then our hands would be tied and we could pass no measure looking to limiting debate.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is always within the power of this House to instruct any committee to report, and the Committee on Rules is not above other committees. Hence, if any bill is upon our Calendar, the passage of which is desired by the majority of the members of this House, a privileged motion can be made here instructing the Committee on Rules to report a special order for taking up, considering, and voting upon that measure, and in that way the House has the matter entirely in its own control. The House itself thereby limits debate, not the Speaker, not the Committee on Rules, and under that state of facts, and because of the necessity for some such power, we ought to adopt the report as it has come from the committee.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Will the gentleman from Tennessee, if he thinks this is so good a rule explain to me how you can amend a report brought in from the Committee on Rules if the Speaker decides that the motion is dilatory?

Mr. WASHINGTON. The gentleman can explain that in his own time. My time has expired.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. I ask the gentleman from Tennessee, how can the House, under this rule, ever amend a report from the Committee on Rules if the Speaker decides that the motion is dilatory?

Mr. WASHINGTON. I say again that the gentleman can explain that in his own time, as my time has expired.

Mr. OATES. Mr. Speaker, I believe that is in order to offer an amendment by way of a substitute for the text, and that that will take precedence over the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER], which is to strike it out.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not hear the gentleman.

Mr. OATES. I desire to offer an amendment, by way of a substitute, for the text, which I believe takes precedence over the motion of the gentleman from Mississippi, which is to strike it out.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not. The Chair thinks that the section must be perfected before a substitute can be offered, either to perfect the text, by striking it out, or adding to it, as the House pleases.

Mr. OATES. The substitute is an amendment, and it seems to me to be in the nature of perfecting the text.

The SPEAKER. The substitute can not be voted upon until the text is perfected in any way that the House desires, whether it be by adding to or taking from it. After the House has dealt with the section by way of amendment, then the substitute will be in order. For instance, there is pending now a substitute for these proposed rules offered by the minority, but it is not in order to vote upon that substitute until the House shall have perfected the rules under consideration.

Mr. OATES. Then I was misinformed by the former temporary occupant of the chair as to the true parliamentary condition.

Mr. BUSHNELL. Would it not be in order to add the amendment to the motion already pending?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman that an amendment to an amendment would be in order; but the gentleman's proposition is a substitute.

Mr. BUSHNELL. I suggest to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES] that he put his motion in that form.

Mr. DICKERSON. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry. Has not the gentleman a right to offer a substitute and have it pending, so that the question may be discussed in the light of the fact that a substitute is offered, although it may not be voted upon until all the amendments are acted upon?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman might have the substitute read, if he desires.

Mr. DICKERSON. Could not he offer it, and have it actually pending, so that it might be before the House?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks so.

Mr. DICKERSON. And then the other amendment could be voted upon with reference to that?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks so.

Mr. BUCHANAN of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, so many statements have been made as to the effect of these words proposed to be struck out, that it may not be amiss to recur sharply to the words themselves. They are these:

> It shall always be in order to call up for consideration a report from the Committee on Rules, and pending the consideration, the Speaker may entertain one motion that the House adjourn; but, after the result is announced, he shall not entertain any other dilatory motion until the said report shall have been fully disposed of.

Let us see what they mean. "It shall always be in order to call up for consideration a report from the Committee on Rules." That means, of course, provided that committee has made a report. I have been a member of this House for six years and I have many times seen my darling measures reported favorably from the committees of this House to die upon the Calendar. The Calendar is a veritable graveyard of blighted hopes and unfulfilled desires. I have never seen the Calendar resorted to for consideration but twice in my legislative experience, and I want to say to you gentlemen that if you have measures that you are sent here by your constituents to forward, measures not merely of local importance to you, but perhaps of great national consequence, these words afford simply an additional means for you to obtain action upon those measures, to wit, it permits you to knock at the door of the Committee on Rules and to ask them: "Won't you please report a special rule by which my measure can be considered?" If they fail to report such a rule this House can not compel them to report, notwithstanding the contrary has been said here. The committee can do just as they please about that; but this rule itself gives them the right to report, and to that extent it is an enlargement of the liberty of the Representative and not a contraction thereof.

Mr. BYNUM. I understood the gentleman to say that the House could compel the committee to report; will he tell us how that can be done?

Mr. BUCHANAN of New Jersey. The gentleman misunderstood me. I say that the House can not compel the committee to report; but members can importune them to report, and without this provision they can not even do that. This gives the member the hope of a possibility of a peradventure, which without this rule he would not have. [Laughter.]

Now, suppose the Committee on Rules have reported, then comes into operation this power as to dilatory motions which was complained of—I do not hesitate to say so dishonestly—during the past two years. The power to say what is a dilatory motion and what is not is lodged in the Speaker. It must be lodged somewhere. The committee can not preside. The Speaker presides, and it is he and he alone that must decide whether any motion when made comes within the limits of the inhibition in the rule or not. That power to decide must be lodged in him, and it is no greater and no less under this proposed provision than it was under the rule that we had in the Fifty-first Congress. I was pleased with the manliness of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ENLOE] when he declared here a few minutes ago that there was some good in the rules of the Fifty-first Congress.

My own idea is that this whole mass of rules has become unwieldy, burdensome, vexatious, useless, and I hope the time may come when we can be so emancipated from the traditions of the past that we will go to work and make a few plain, simple rules, such as our fathers had in the early days, and such as will give the representatives of the people an opportunity to have their measures acted upon.

By unanimous consent, Mr. BUCHANAN'S time was extended five minutes.

Mr. BUCHANAN of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, along the Atlantic coast you will find here and there a gigantic tree, and in the top of that tree you will find a great mass of sticks and leaves and twigs and rubbish—the nest of the osprey or common fishhawk. Year by year the old bird returns to the same old nest and adds to the mass, until at last the accumulation becomes so great that the tree is smothered to death. Sir, the accumulation of this rule rubbish has been so great year by year in the Congress of the United States that the voices of the representatives of the people have been smothered [applause]; and if I were to coin a phrase I would no longer call this code the rules of the House of Representatives, but the fishhawk's nest of the House of Representatives. [Laughter.]

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Speaker, the only objection to this rule, so far as I have been able to ascertain from the discussion, seems to be that it invests the Committee on Rules with more power than the members of this House think that committee ought to have. I do not think, sir, that that objection is well taken to the rule. I think the trouble with most of the members of the House about this rule is a fear that the Committee on Rules will not act and report upon measures which in the judgment of such members ought to be considered by the House, and in favor of the consideration of which such members think this committee ought to report a rule.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the motion is to strike out the language of this rule which gives the committee that power. If it is stricken out what will be the result? The result will be that you can do no business, and the scenes of filibustering, so common in the Fiftieth Congress, which members of this House who were present so well remember, will be reënacted on this floor. On the compound-lard bill, the silver bill, or any tariff bill that may come up for consideration, which can muster against it a sufficient number of members, those scenes will be reproduced, and it takes but very few members to adopt the filibustering tactics which were used in that Congress.

Mr. BLAND. One man can do it.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Yes, one man can do it. Now, Mr. Speaker, striking out this rule, we have that condition of things with reference to every bill that comes into this House. By keeping it in here we have a jurisdiction in the Committee on Rules which authorizes it to bring in at any time a rule by which such filibustering may be stopped, not by the Speaker, but by the action of the House itself. All that this rule does is to put it in the power of this House, by a majority vote, to determine whether it will stop, whether it will act, and what its action shall be. It is for the House to determine the question and not for the Committee on Rules, much less the Speaker, as in the last House.

Now, as to the power that gives to this committee, I have examined the rule very carefully and I can not find that it gives that committee any more power than any other committee of this House has. It may propose for consideration rules, as any other committee may legislate within its jurisdiction, and the House, absolutely determining its own proceeding, may adopt or reject.

Any member can offer a rule for governing the action of this House on any subject and have it submitted to the Committee on Rules, which is the appropriate committee. When gentlemen object that the rule under discussion vests too much power in that committee their objection, reduced to all there is in it, is that the committee will have the power to report or not to report back to this House such action on this subject so submitted as in their judgment may seem best.

Sir, every committee in this House has similar power to report or not report with reference to every bill referred to it. The trouble, I apprehend, with gentlemen who say that this proposition vests too much power in this committee grows out of a feeling on their part that if a majority of the committee should be opposed to preventing filibustering and opposed to bringing a question to a vote, there is no power behind the committee to compel it to make a report and to call up that report. Assuming that to be the fact, are you in any worse position than if this proposed rule were stricken out? I submit that in the case supposed the gentlemen interested in any particular measure for which the Committee on Rules might be unwilling to fix a time would be in no worse situation than they would be if we refuse to adopt this by striking it out as the amendment proposes.

Hence, Mr. Speaker, I see nothing objectionable in this proposed rule. Its whole effect is simply that as this committee is already privileged, its reports shall be privileged, and that the House, not the Committee on Rules, shall be empowered under this rule, if a majority wish it, to force a vote on the question whether the House shall act upon the measure sought to be considered, or shall refuse to act and allow the measure to remain under the power of those who may choose to filibuster against its consideration.

So far as I can see, this proposed rule vests no more power in the Committee on Rules than is already vested in every other committee in the House. It simply enables this committee to bring in a report which will vest in this House a power it would not otherwise have, of compelling action by a majority of its members upon any measure against which filibustering might otherwise prevail. It is then left for the House to determine whether it will act or refuse to act, by a majority vote adopting or rejecting the report from the Committee on Rules. It in no sense enlarges the powers of the Committee on Rules, but does enlarge the power of the House to determine and control its own action, and deprives a few members—without this rule one is sufficient—of the power to obstruct and thereby defeat all effort at legislation.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Mr. Speaker, the Constitution of the United States vests in each House of Congress the power to prescribe its own rules of proceedings, and the question presented to us to-day is whether we shall exercise that power or whether we shall abdicate it. There is no warrant, sir, for the statement made by some gentlemen here that when the House has once had presented to it and has adopted a set of rules its constitutional power with reference to the rules is exhausted. The Constitution intended that this power should begin with the beginning of the House and continue until its end. No human foresight can tell what emergency may during a session of Congress arise which will make it important and imperative that the rules first adopted should in some respect be changed or modified.

Mr. Speaker, the question is: Shall we reserve to ourselves the right to exercise at any time during the continuance of the Congress this constitutional power, or shall we here and now forever put manacles upon our hands and disable ourselves from meeting such emergencies as may arise?

Mr. Speaker, those of us who were here in the Fiftieth Congress saw the rules of this House so abused and perverted that one man stood here and obstructed public business for days and days. We saw that continued until the disgraceful spectacle was presented to the country of the Speaker of this House bargaining with that gentleman in order that the business of this House might be allowed to proceed. There was a notorious bargain made by which that gentleman who had obstructed all business compelled the consideration of a bill in which he was interested before allowing the Speaker to proceed with the business of the House.

Gentlemen have argued this question as if the adoption of this proposed change in the rules of the Fiftieth Congress would in some sense restrain this House—as if it would take from the House some power which it has hitherto exercised. Why, sir, that is not true. No gentleman will presume to assert that to be a fact. Suppose, Mr. Speaker, that the House has power, without this proceeding, to come to a vote upon a question; it may proceed to exercise that power notwithstanding this provision be incorporated in the rules. Suppose that the Committee on Rules should never exercise this power proposed to be conferred upon it; the House can proceed with the business as best it may. By this proposed rule—I challenge any gentleman to deny my assertion—not a single constraint is placed upon this House collectively, or upon any individual member. Any member would have the same right, if we should adopt it, that he would have if we should strike it out.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the gentleman from Mississippi permit a question?

Mr. CATCHINGS. Yes, sir.

Mr. BAILEY. If it does not change it why put it in the rule?

Mr. CATCHINGS. I did not state that it did not change it. I made no such assertion. I said it placed no restriction upon the members. It does enlarge the power of this House, by that provision, to proceed to act and vote upon measures against which obstructive tactics may perhaps have been applied.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I assert that if the Democrats had carried the last Congress—the Fifty-first—there would have been a provision something like this, looking to lodging this power in the House, inserted in the rules. I know that it was a matter of common talk amongst us on this side in the preceding Congress, that we were sitting here like children and babies, making ourselves a laughingstock and ridiculous before the country and the world by our helplessness. With the condition of things then existing we could not take a single step forward in matters of legislation if any one chose to obstruct it, and if we had controlled the Fifty-first Congress I have no doubt we would have improved upon the rules of the preceding Congress in this particular.

Vote this provision down, lodge the power here conferred nowhere, and less than six weeks will pass before this country will be looking upon us as a helpless body, pretending to pass laws, but so bound, so shackled, so hampered by our own rules as to be utterly unable to transact the public business.

But, Mr. Speaker, I want to make another statement. The impression went abroad that in the last Congress the Democratic members of the House opposed the rules proposed by gentlemen on the other side, because they sought to lodge that power in the Speaker or somewhere to bring business to an end when it had proceeded sufficiently long.

I have gone through every debate on that subject, and I assert now that no gentleman who addressed this House on this side of the Chamber uttered a single word which suggested that the House should be denied the power to close debate under suitable circumstances. The whole avalanche of debate on this side of the House was directed against the method suggested by gentlemen on the other side. My friend from Maine [Mr. REED] smiles at my statement. I reiterate it, and repeat now that not a solitary word was uttered in debate by any gentleman on this side which sought to deny that the House should have this power.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this provision of the rule takes no power away from the House. The Committee on Rules may make a suggestion, but they must report that suggestion to the House. They recommend that at a given time a vote shall be taken on a pending proposition. It is not binding upon the House. The House can accept it or reject it, as it chooses. The committee makes its report, and it is for the House to act upon it.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I cordially agree with the gentleman from Mississippi that there was in the Fiftieth Congress a specimen of filibustering, which was permitted by the rules of the House, but which ought not to be allowed to exist; and I regret that the Committee on Rules has inserted in its report the means by which that disgraceful filibustering was accomplished, instead of striking it out absoluty. The filibustering of the Fiftieth Congress was accomplished by the use of the two privilged motions, alternating them—the motion to adjourn to a day fixed and to take a recess—and therefore the simplest mode of breaking up that particular form of filibustering has been squarely prevented by the committee declining to take the privilege from these motions. They have retained them in the rule, and therefore it does not come well for the gentleman to oppose this particular amendment on the ground that thereby filibustering is prevented. We will propose to the Committee on Rules to strike those motions out when we get to that section.

I also agree with the gentleman from Mississippi, and with my colleague from Kentucky [Mr. MONTGOMERY] who preceded him, that this does not very greatly enlarge the powers of the Committee on Rules; and if it did, that is not my principal objection. I think it is unwise to give the committee the power; but as it has been given heretofore, and we may have to trust the power to direct the order of business to somebody, and as my friend from Alabama [Mr. OATES] will never be able to get his motion through, we may accept that part of the report.

Mr. OATES. I have been trying to get the proposition in as an amendment.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. I know; but I fear the attempt is hopeless. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that this provision is unwise for another and a more fundamental reason. What I uttered in the Fifty-first Congress I believed, and shall vote in the Fifty-second Congress under those principles. I do not believe the Speaker of the House, in protection to himself and his own character, his own influence, and in consonance with the dignity of the House, ought to be given the power to declare what is a dilatory motion.

Mr. BLAND. May I ask my friend frankly a question?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Certainly, if my time is extended sufficiently.

Mr. BLAND. Did we not give that very power to Mr. Speaker CARLISLE, and do you not preserve in these rules in another place, where a motion is made to suspend the rules, almost the very language of this rule?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Yes, but I will say to the gentleman——

Mr. BLAND. The power which we gave to a Democratic House and ever have, the very power in the Speaker to determine that he will not entertain a dilatory motion. There is nothing new in it.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. My friend from Missouri [Mr. BLAND]—and I say it with very great respect—injected an argument under the pretense of asking me if I would not allow him to ask a question; but I like him so much, and he has got so in the habit of that, that for the two reasons I did not attempt to interrupt him. [Laughter.]

I will say, Mr. Speaker, that in the first place it would be no argument against what I am saying unless it could be proved that I personally advocated that rule. I submitted to it, as I have submitted to a great many other things in the rules, because I had no particular power over it, and I submitted to it, too, because of its being comparatively innocuous, as I shall attempt to show in a moment. It is wholly unlike this.

In the first place I want to say to this House that the filibusterer is a scarecrow that is being used to destroy the liberty of the House. He is a mere scarecrow, brought into this House to alarm it at the beginning of a session; and the new members, who have not sat here and heard the filibusterer before, are the ones who are to be particularly alarmed by this scarecrow. As a rule the filibusterer is a first-rate fellow. Under Mr. Randall he prevented the force bill from being put upon the people fifteen years ago, and if he had never done anything more I for one take off my hat to him for that service. [Applause on the Democratic side.] For twelve years he stood here and prevented the educational bill from being passed; and when the Republicans got possession of this House, the Republican Senate did not send that educational bill over here; and for that I thank the filibusterer. He is not an unmixed evil. It is not proved that he is a man to be entirely cut. He is quite a good gentleman, to be on pleasant terms with when the majority does undertake to do something bad and you want to get time for deliberation.

But we ought to obstruct the obstructor in some way. The poorest way to do that is by giving to the Speaker power to declare what are dilatory motions. I do not mean this Speaker or any other particular Speaker, for I am speaking impersonally and would have spoken in the same way, no matter who had been Speaker, as I did in the Fifty-first Congress. I predicted in that Congress, before there was any bitterness, that no Speaker could be intrusted with this power without in the end having himself subjected to unkind criticisms and without creating disturbances and unpleasant scenes upon the floor

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. I ask unanimous consent that I may be allowed to proceed for five minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. I believe that to be true, and that it can not be done. No Speaker can do it. It is not within the power of man to do it. I do not believe that Mr. CARLISLE, who was the most impartial man I ever knew, could possibly have done it.

In addition to that, Mr. Speaker, this particular rule has the effect that, if the Speaker so chooses, the report of the committee can never be amended by the action of the House. It is driven to pass the report as it comes from the committee or to vote it down. Now, we know that under this rule all the Speaker has to do is to say that a motion to amend is dilatory—and I am not now injecting any of the bitterness of the former Congress into this debate; I want specially to disclaim anything of that kind, because I am trying to discuss the matter from a perfectly nonpolitical view. It has been decided, and you will find precedents to that effect, that any sort of a motion can be used as a dilatory motion. The distinguished ex-Speaker of the last House [Mr. REED] expressly said the other day that that could be done.

An appeal has been decided to be a dilatory motion. All the Speaker has to do is to decide, after a motion to adjourn has been voted down, that every motion is dilatory, and so force the House to an immediate vote upon the report. Now, there are a great many reports which we would like to vote for, which, if amended we would approve of and vote for, but which we do not like in the form in which they are presented. To illustrate: Suppose they bring in a rule providing that the free-coinage bill shall be discussed for two hours and then brought to a vote. I may be willing to say "Yes, let us bring it to a vote," but I might say it was unfair to bring it to a vote after two hours of debate. Or suppose the rule provided that there could be only two amendments proposed, as was the case as to the silver bill in the last Congress. I would not restrict the House to two amendments; and yet, if I was brought to a vote directly on the report, I might feel compelled to vote for a report containing some objectionable features, which I would prefer to have amended. So that the House is manacled by this, if the Speaker chooses.

This is pro tanto the rule of the Fifty-first Congress that gave the Speaker power to refuse to entertain a dilatory motion. Here the Committee on Rules selects the bills as to which such power may be exercised; there the Speaker selected. There the Speaker could be expected to be impartial, as the rule applied to all reports from all committees; here it applies only to the reports made by the committee of which the Speaker is chairman. The principle is precisely the same; the scope of its application is restricted.

Now, one moment as to the rule to suspend the rules, and my friend from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] will see how different it is from this if he thinks of it for a moment. Before a measure can be considered under a motion for a suspension of the rules a majority of this House has to second it. The House has to say, "I second the motion." So that thereby they have an opportunity to declare that they will not go into its consideration. That is, a majority of the House. Thus it is a majority of the House and not a majority of a committee that insures consideration. In the second place, it requires a vote of two-thirds of the members present to pass the bill. It is within the power of one-third of the members present to prevent its passage. I believe it is unwise in this particular form to give that power to the Speaker, but that power can only be exercised on two days of the month and then it requires a majority of the House to second a motion, and then two-thirds of the House to pass the bill; and it is thus limited by three important restrictions.

If you should ask me what remedy I propose to diminish filibustering, I would say strike this out of this report, adopt a code for the ordinary business of the House and proceed therewith. No such contingency will arise until the Calendar gets full. Meanwhile the Committee on Rules, after this debate, can take up this question and see if they can not frame a rule that will be satisfactory to both sides of this House, and that will give on great occasions the power to some committee to fix the consideration and impose a limitation or restriction that will be proper. There is no reason why we should now adopt this rule or an amendment proposed in the heat of debate. That is a matter the Committee on Rules can take up and introduce hereafter at their leisure, after the adoption of the remainder of the code. A nonpolitical report, as the results of their deliberations, and such a rule as is necessary, can be adopted by the entire House.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I would ask the gentleman if members could not filibuster against that report and prevent its adoption?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Oh, yes.

Mr. ENLOE. Will the gentleman from Kentucky yield to me for a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Kentucky yield to the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. To which gentleman from Tennessee? I will either answer them singly or in chorus, as gentlemen may prefer.

Mr. ENLOE. I want to ask the gentleman from Kentucky if the course he suggests should be pursued, and the Committee on Rules should bring in a report proposing a rule which he thinks would be acceptable to this House, and it should prove not acceptable to eight or ten gentlemen, how long could they filibuster so as to prevent its adoption?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. That simply is based upon the idea that this House filibusters against everything that a majority may object to, but my judgment is, that if you strike out the two privileged motions "to adjourn to a day certain," and "to take a recess," there will be no trouble by filibustering with it, no more than there is any danger that we who are opposed to this rule are going to filibuster against its adoption.

Mr. OATES. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer, by way of amendment, a substitute, which I ask to have read at the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

That there shall be a committee on order of business, to consist of fifteen members; ten of said members, including the Speaker, shall be Democrats, and five of said members shall be of the opposition; the members of said committee shall be selected by their respective caucuses, but the Speaker shall be ex officio chairman of said committee. Its jurisdiction shall be to consider and report upon all propositions as to the order of consideration and precedence of business other than that prescribed by the rules of the House; and said committee shall have the right to report at any time.

Mr. OATES. Mr. Speaker, I heard a remark fall from the lips of a member which well illustrates the difference between him and me. He remarked that that was "nonsense." He is in favor of one-man power; I am not. I believe in a judicious and proper exercise of the power of the people as vested in the members of this House. I offer that proposition because I believe it will be a relief to the Speaker of this House, and anything that will relieve him of responsibility and will tend to make his situation more nearly conform to that of the Speaker of the British Parliament is decidedly an improvement, as it would practically strip him of his partisan character. It does not make him in all cases an impartial presiding officer.

Now, sir, if the committee be raised in that way, its jurisdiction is defined to settle what the order of business shall be, other than as prescribed in the rules. Where gentlemen offer propositions on which action is required, which fixes time for the consideration of particular bills, these propositions should be referred to that committee. There is a provision in it which gives a representation to each party there, which would make it truly representative, and its members might be composed of men who are not skilled in parliamentary tactics and usages such as properly control the Committee on Rules.

Nor is there anything in the proposition which would exclude the membership of the Committee on Rules from being members of this committee if the caucus should see proper to select them. The proposition makes the Speaker the chairman ex officio of this committee, because he ought to be in contact with it so that he may know the will of the House in respect to the disposition of its business. Such a committee, it is supposed, would have better opportunities of knowing the will of the House than a committee so limited in number as the Committee on Rules can possibly have. This is simply a proposition to distribute this business into the hands of members selected by the respective parties composing the majority and the minority of this House, so as to give consideration fairly and justly to measures which should have precedence.

Every member who has had much experience here knows that in the progress of the session the Calendars become so crowded that we can never hope to return to them to dispose of the business thereon. Some measures, therefore, have to be given precedence over others, in addition to the reports from committees, which are privileged under the ordinary rules, and this, instead of being intrusted to the Committee on Rules, ought, in my judgment, to be intrusted to a larger and more representative committee, leaving the Committee on Rules to exercise all of the jurisdiction which has pertained to it until within the last few years, when it has become the fashion to refer all these questions to that committee, thereby enlarging its powers beyond the sphere which was originally intended.

I believe this proposition would give more general satisfaction to members of the House. I have no apprehension about filibustering. While I have seen filibustering here and participated in it, I do not regard it as an unmixed evil. I believe that while filibustering has been sometimes resorted to when it should not have been, yet in the main more good than harm has resulted from it. It has been paraded here as a great evil, which has reached the climax almost of indecency. That is not true. It at least gives time for deliberation. The filibustering that was alluded to in this debate with reference to the direct-tax bill, filibustering which continued for nine days, originated in this way: There was a report from the Committee on Rules putting that bill ahead of every other, not giving to the Judiciary Committee the ordinary right to select its own measures for consideration, but giving that bill the right of way and attempting to force it upon this House, and when I, representing the minority of the committee, asked the gentleman in charge of the measure to allow those opposed to it three hours for debate, that was denied, and we were restricted to one hour. Hence that filibustering was resorted to which caused the postponement of the measure from that session until the next, and then in that next session there was an agreement that three days should be given for its discussion, and that discussion largely increased the opposition to it by showing to the House and the country its enormities.

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Speaker, it is with some diffidence that I attempt to participate in a discussion of rules projected for the government of a body with whose proceedings I am not myself very familiar, and if I venture to take the floor upon this subject it is only because I feel that I may give the House the benefit of a judgment which is perhaps more impartial than the judgment of those who may have become affected in the past by the contentions involved in this debate. I have listened with some interest to what has been said of the rights of the minority, and of the tyranny of Speakers, and of the right spoken of by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CHIPMAN], which he described, I believe, as the constitutional right of a member to do what he pleased on the floor of the House. Mr. Speaker, I have found it impossible, in any examination which I have given to the history of parliamentary institutions, to discover anything which justifies these claims about the extraordinary rights of the minority.

If a majority can not absolutely control a representative body, then parliamentary institutions are without an excuse for their existence. The very essence of parliamentary government is that the majority shall rule, and that the minority shall submit. All these rules, of which we have heard so much, which are said to have been devised for the protection of the minority, have really been adopted for the purpose of ascertaining the existence of a majority upon any proposition, and they are perverted from their original purpose when they are used to impair the control of the House by the majority of its members.

I have heard much about filibustering. I have heard denunciations of it, I have heard apologies for it, and I have heard something from the distinguished gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] that almost sounded like a panegyric upon it. [Laughter.] Now, Mr. Speaker, I believe that in the history of this country there was just one occasion when filibustering was excusable and defensible if not laudable, and that was when a majority which had been discredited at the polls attempted, in the expiring moments of their power, to strike a deadly blow against the liberties of the people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

But, sir, I believe the exercise of the power to obstruct by filibustering the proceedings of the House should be reserved for occasions when the very existence of the Government is imperiled. I believe it is a right almost akin to that of rebellion, and that the man who stands out in opposition to the orderly procedure of the House of which he is a member is not carrying out its rules, or discharging his functions, or obeying his oath, but is attempting by extraordinary methods to obstruct the progress of the Government itself. Had filibustering been confined to that one occasion which I have mentioned—had filibustering been suspended until a similar occasion should justify its use—had it never occurred except in situations of such momentous gravity that public opinion would have justified it and approved of it—there never would have been rules of this character proposed for the government of this body.

We have seen filibustering tried in the great representative body whose constitution forms the model of this body. We have seen three or four men take advantage of the rules of the House of Commons to hold Parliament impotent for days and nights, and the civilized world has applauded their course. But that filibustering was undertaken by men who were hostile to the existence of the Parliament itself. Their justification was that they were engaged in an attempt to render the body powerless that they might by its impotence secure rights which an alien Government had denied them. When such a condition exists here, then, and not till then, will filibustering be justifiable. If we are to preserve parliamentary government we must have obedience by the minority; absolute submission to the will of the majority when the existence of that majority shall have been properly ascertained.

Now, what is the character of this proposed rule? If there be projected anywhere any attempt to defraud this House of its inherent rights, if there be an attempt to create for a minority powers subversive of those of a majority, anything that renders the count which determines a question doubtful or inaccurate, then, Mr. Speaker, I believe that such a rule is vicious and should be condemned the very moment it is suggested. What is the character of this rule? It is simply a provision for taking the sense of the House as to whether it will proceed to take action upon a given subject.

Mr. MCKENNA. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] may be permitted to proceed.

There was no objection.

Mr. COCKRAN. I listened with attention, and, indeed, with admiration, to the remarks of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BUCHANAN] when he closed his speech with the prayer that we might return to the simple rules of our fathers, the simple rules that governed this Congress at a period immediately following the adoption of the Constitution. Sir, I echo that prayer. I deplore the growth of the power of the Speaker. I deplore every device that in its adoption recognizes a necessity for some method of exercising coercive force over any portion of this House.

I would gladly welcome a return by all the members to that loyal acceptation of the Constitution and of the principles of representative government which guaranties to every man the right to be heard, which guaranties to all the privilege of free discussion, so that a decision by the majority may be based upon reason rather than upon passion, and which, having guarantied to all that right, holds every member obedient to the will of the House when its judgment has been recorded. When such a spirit of loyalty to the House shall govern all its members rules of this character will have become unnecessary.

It has been said here that there can be no harm if we do not adopt this rule; that filibustering is a good deal of a scarecrow to which we should take off our hats for what it has done and what it has not done.

If taking off the hat be simply a manifestation of politeness, a recognition of the fact that once this scarecrow was serviceable, if it be an adieu and not an invitation to return, I am prepared to make the salutation.

But if it be held that any measure to remove obstruction is an invasion of the rights of the individual member, and if this House should adopt a body of rules which would recognize obstruction as a legitimate parliamentary weapon, I shall be ready to use it, and it will be my duty to use it, because its use will have the supreme sanction of a vote of this body itself.

There is legislation projected in committee which I condemn strongly. Legislation may come before this House which will be hostile to the interests of my constituents, and, as I believe, to the interests of the whole country. And if this weapon be fashioned by this House and placed upon my desk, would I be loyal to that constituency and to the country if I did not use it in their defense? I do not believe it is a fair weapon of parliamentary warfare. I condemn it as hostile to the very principles upon which parliamentary institutions are founded. But if it be approved by this House and commended to its members as a legitimate weapon, then I expect to wield it with as vigorous an arm as any gentleman who believes in filibustering as an essential right of the minority.

There can be no halfway position here. Filibustering is either proper or improper. Its existence in the past is admitted by both sides of the House. This rule is designed, if not absolutely to prevent it, at least to diminish it. And, sir, I believe that by the adoption of these rules, even if we have to confer extraordinary power upon a committee, even if we have to extend and strengthen the prerogatives of the Speaker, we are reaching the logical position where we shall demonstrate that it is not well for any minority, that it is not advantageous to any cause, to resist the absolute right of the House to be governed by the majority; and when all shall have recognized this elementary principle, when the House is ready to trust itself, it can then withdraw these extraordinary powers from the committee and from the Speaker. [Applause.]

Mr. BYNUM. Mr. Speaker, I think that the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN], if he had examined this proposed code more carefully, would have found that all the evils against which he has inveighed are maintained and perpetuated in these rules.

This rule does not stop filibustering in the House. Filibustering was carried on successfully under clause 4 of Rule XVI. All the evils of that rule are retained in the present code, and are to be perpetuated by this system of rules if adopted.

Why, just suppose that the members of the Committee on Rules, instead of standing in sympathy with the majority of the House, are in sympathy with the minority that may be engaged in filibustering? This rule only prevents the House from filibustering against a resolution reported from the Committee on Rules. Suppose you strike any other bill on the Calendar, or that a majority may desire to take up, consider, and pass a bill which the minority may desire should not be considered or passed, the minority so desiring could resort to filibustering under this rule. It does not prevent them at all. The only way you can prevent filibustering is to go to the Committee on Rules and ask them to interpose a report which will put a stop to it. If that committee be in sympathy with the minority there is no power in the House to stop the filibustering.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the amendment I propose has reference to Rule XVI and is designed to stop filibustering on all questions, as well as on the report of the Committee on Rules. I propose to clothe the House, by means of the amendment I suggest, with the power to carry on the business of the House, instead of clothing the minority of the House with power to filibuster and compel the majority to go to the Committee on Rules for relief. If relief is not afforded there, there is no possibility of affording it anywhere else. If my amendment is adopted it will stop very much of this useless filibustering, and the report of the Committee on Rules will stand just as the report of every other committee, to be decided by a majority of the House under the rules of the House which are fixed by this regulation for the transaction of public business.

Mr. REED. To what rule does the gentleman refer?

Mr. BYNUM. I am referring now to the amendment which I propose to clause 4 of Rule XVI, which strikes out the motion to fix a day to which the House shall adjourn and the motion for a recess. So that if the amendment be adopted, it will not be possible to alternate these two motions as they have been used heretofore for purposes of filibustering.

Mr. REED. Does the gentleman from Indiana undertake to say that that amendment will stop filibustering?

Mr. BYNUM. I undertake to say that it will stop it in this House to the greatest extent, or to the fullest extent, which it can be stopped under any system of rules which we may adopt for our guidance here. Of course, if there is a man who wants to stand up here and obstruct business, simply for the purpose of obstruction, there is no power—give what power to the Committee on Rules you will—that can put a stop to it, except it be by a resolution to expel him.

Now, for my own part, I am perfectly willing to confer on this Committee on Rules the power to say when a measure shall be brought before this House, and when a vote shall be taken upon it. It is very different, however, from conferring on them the power to bring in a rule when they may desire to stop filibustering, and to leave the filibusterers in control of the House when they do not so desire. It is quite a different thing. I am willing to intrust them to take a bill—whenever there is a resolution committed to them for that purpose—to take a bill out of its proper place upon the Calendar and bring it forward, putting it before the House; but when the House reaches in its order a bill on the Calendar, I respectfully contend that the House should have the power to proceed with its consideration just as well as if it had come through a report from the Committee on Rules, and without having it go to any committee to ask for its consideration.

For that reason, while I am not seriously opposing this provision, I am, on principle, opposed to it. Therefore if it is stricken out, and the amendment I proposed is adopted, filibustering on all questions will be eliminated from the proceedings of this body just so far as it is possible to eliminate them under the rules of the House.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that there is some misapprehension as to the force and effect of this rule, and the changes made in it. I undertake to say, sir, that it is a rule that has prevailed here I think since the Forty-seventh Congress, under all Democratic administrations, with one single exception. There is nothing new in it. It is the rule of the Democratic party, and has always been. It is a part of Democratic rules which has never been questioned. This rule simply confers on the Committee on Rules a power to report at any time. Without this clause it has always been so. There is nothing different, nothing new, in it. There is no necessity for any alarm about it. It is precisely the same, in all respects, with the single exception that when that committee reports a proposition but one dilatory motion may be entertained.

Now, what is a dilatory motion? The provision itself states what is a dilatory motion. But one motion to adjourn shall be entertained; or, after one motion to adjourn, no other dilatory motion. What is a dilatory motion? Any other motion of a similar character, that is to adjourn or take a recess. Why, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] undertakes to mislead this House by saying that under that clause the Speaker could declare an amendment to be a dilatory motion. I undertake to say, sir, that no Speaker who had any regard for himself as a presiding officer of this House, proceeding under parliamentary law, would regard any motion either in the nature of an amendment or a substitute or an amendment to an amendment or any similar motion authorized by the rules of this House as a dilatory motion. He would not regard it as such and would not rule it out as such, because the rule itself declares what is a dilatory motion and cuts off motions of but one such character as dilatory motions.

But the gentleman from Kentucky says that the Democratic precedents have been very small. The Democratic party has always, or at least since the Forty-seventh Congress, I think, provided that the Speaker should not entertain a dilatory motion after one motion to adjourn, on a motion to suspend the rules. We have always had that. Nobody ever complained about it. I never heard any complaint from the gentleman from Kentucky before about that proposition. Speaker CARLISLE presided when that was the rule of this House, and no complaint was ever made as to his fairness or unfairness, because it designated "a motion to adjourn, and no other dilatory motion," defining what a dilatory motion is. But the gentleman from Kentucky said it required a majority to bring that motion before the House. It will require a majority of the House to adopt a report from the Committee on Rules, and therefore there is nothing in that objection.

My experience here, Mr. Speaker, is that whenever the Speaker of this House, or a political majority in it, see fit to change the rules in the interests of domineering over the minority, they will find some excuse for doing it. I hope this side of the House will enact no rule of that kind, and it has not done so here. This rule is simply for the purpose of providing some way by which this House may transact some business, in case there is a disposition on the part of the minority to prevent any legislation.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BLAND. Certainly.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Why is it not better to adopt the rule of the Fifty-first Congress, that no dilatory motion be recognized on any report? That stops it, at the pleasure of the majority, through the Speaker, on every occasion.

Mr. BLAND. I thank the gentleman for that question, because that brings me to another point. The rule of the Fifty-first Congress vested in the Speaker of this House the power to gag this House by his own ruling. That I would never do, or anything like it. The rules of the Fifty-first Congress gave it into the power of the Speaker himself, by his arbitrary ruling, to bring this House to a vote, and to cut off any motion that he himself denominated dilatory in all of our proceedings. This simply says that the Speaker and his Committee on Rules may report to this House a rule by which legislation may be facilitated, and that question is submitted to the House itself, and not to the Speaker. We reserve to ourselves the right to say whether we will adopt a rule presented by the Committee on Rules or not. If it is an arbitrary rule, a rule that cuts off any right, we will vote it down, but we do claim we have a right to vote upon that, and not have it filibustered until doomsday.

The time of Mr. BLAND having expired, by unanimous consent he was accorded two minutes more.

Mr. BLAND. Now, Mr. Speaker. I state very frankly that if the Republican party in the last Congress had proposed nothing more than this simple rule to facilitate business, and had gone no further than that to prevent delay and undue filibustering, this side of the House could not have maintained itself in opposition to it, in view of what had taken place in the preceding Congress. Gentlemen, we are at the beginning of this session, and having been here for some time, I warn you that the Republican party in this House to-day, in order to justify their rules, could, if they were so disposed, without this rule or some rule like it, filibuster until you might as well go home and go to sleep, for you would not pass a single bill. They could drive you out of this House and in that way justify themselves in adopting the tyrannical rules of the last Congress. They could show to this country the necessity for the rules they had, and plead that as an argument, by blocking all the legislation of this House and compelling you at last to adopt this rule in self defense.

Why not adopt it in the beginning. I remember the adoption of a rule when Mr. Keifer was Speaker of this House. We had held the matter up for some time, probably a week or so, until they were by necessity compelled to violate their own rules in order to go on with legislation. They were compelled to report a rule from the Committee on Rules, and the Speaker, in order to shut off any filibustering that might be made, said that a report changing the rules of the House was a constitutional privilege, and he would entertain no motion until that was voted upon. Do you want be driven to that extremity? Is it not better to define your rules now? Is it not better to devise some plan by which the majority of this House can do something?

Mr. BYNUM. Will the enactment of this provision stop filibustering?

Mr. BLAND. I do not think it will; and I want to say that I am not opposed to filibustering. If you have a bill here and I do not like it, and you do not want to give me time to debate it, I will filibuster against it as long as any man will stand by me, and endeavor to prevent its passage, unless a majority of the House sees proper to prevent it under an order from the Committee on Rules. It does not prevent filibustering. It can go on until the House and the country are satisfied that it ought to be stopped, and then you have some way to do it. With this rule you are not at the mercy of any one man who wants to stop the wheels of legislation. There is nothing in this rule that can be objected to. It is a rule that I think we can adopt and put it in the power of the Committee on Rules to make a report.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BUSHNELL. I desire to say a few words. [Cries of "Adjourn!"] I yield to a motion to adjourn if I can have the floor in the morning.

Mr. CATCHINGS. The gentleman can go on with his remarks.

Mr. BUSHNELL. Mr. Speaker, I only desire to take up a little time. I thoroughly agree with the idea that a majority, under the constitutional limitations, shall rule, and that whatever is necessary to establish the rule of the majority, within these limitations, and enable us to transact business, ought to be adopted as a rule of this House. If the rule reported by the committee is necessary to that end, I am in favor of it. If a less stringent one can be found that will answer the same purpose, I shall favor that.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that there is a great deal of misapprehension in this House, as to the real difference between the rules of the Fifty-first Congress, and the rules of the Fiftieth Congress and all the Congresses that preceded it.

I do not understand, sir, that the Democrats of this House are, or that the Democrats of the Fifty-first Congress were, opposed to the rule of the majority, or that they desired by the action they took in that Congress, to prevent the rule of the majority within constitutional limits. It was their right to have, and they did desire, a fair opportunity to discuss the proceedings and measures that were brought before that House, and they resorted, as was their right, to all legitimate parliamentary tactics to obtain that opportunity.

But the main difference between the rules of the Fifty-first Congress and those of all the previous Congresses, is found in subdivision 3 of Rule XV, and has scarcely been referred to, or even hinted at, by any gentleman who has spoken on the pending question from the Republican side.

That subdivision gave the Speaker power to count, announce, and determine, the presence of a quorum, whether there was present and voting, a quorum or not. The wrong in it, and done under it, may be summed up in a single proposition, viz: That through it, less than a majority of that Congress, could, and often did, usurp the prerogative of a majority, by compelling the opposition to vest in them, the power to pass laws

Whether those laws were good, or bad, is wholly immaterial. The wrong lies in the power given, of usurpation.

Under the Constitution, it takes a clear majority of this House, to pass any measure. In the Fifty-first Congress the Republican majority was so small, that often, through absentees from sickness, or other causes, they had no majority at all, but were actually a minority of the House. To enable that minority, then to do, what only a majority could lawfully do, they adopted this rule, by which they compelled the Democrats to help them to make up a quorum, that is, a majority of the House, by empowering the Speaker to count as present and doing business, those who did not vote; and then they, a minority of the House, but a majority of that quorum so obtained, proceeded to legislate.

Whether the count to make up that quorum, and that determination as to whether there was a quorum present and doing business, were right, depended upon the integrity of one man, the Speaker.

To secure the passage of that rule, the Speaker of the last House enforced the rule before its adoption. And thus it was that the rulings of the most eminent Speakers of the House, Republicans as well as Democrats, who had ruled upon the question, were disregarded, and rule by the minority was set up, by men calling themselves Republicans, a few of whom are here now, over there on the left, drifts from the deluge of November, 1890, tough remains, sandwiched in between a wholesome lining of Democrats on either side of them; and they, preach to us about the sacred right of the majority to rule.

Thus it was, that in the last House, the precedents of a century of Congresses were overthrown; one-man rule was inaugurated; and less than a majority of this House, some of whom were believed to be knowingly and intentionally acting in the interest of monopolists and extortioners, usurped the prerogative of a clear majority, and passed laws through this House, not meant to subserve the best good of the masses of the people, but laws to benefit the few, and against the interest of the many.

How that Republican Congress sought to fortify their party in power, against an anticipated majority of the people in opposition to those laws; how they admitted into the Union the Territories of Wyoming and Idaho, both together having less population than a single Congressional district in the older States, and thus put into the Senate four Republican Senators, to help out their meager majority there, and other equally bad, and worse measures, passed and attempted, to bind and fasten upon the people the burdens they placed upon them, beyond their powers of resistance, is subject-matter for future consideration.

I submit, that by the adoption of the rule as reported by the committee, or some modification of it, we do not sanction, or in any sense approve, the obnoxious features of the rules of the Fifty-first Congress.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I move that the House adjourn; and pending that, I yield to the gentleman from Rhode Island.

Mr. LAPHAM. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Mississippi withdraws the motion to adjourn, of course the Chair will decide who shall be recognized.

Mr. LAPHAM. I ask the gentleman to withdraw the motion, so that I may introduce a bill.

The SPEAKER. But, of course, if the gentleman from Mississippi withdraws the motion the Chair will have charge of recognitions.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I withdraw the motion.

INTERNATIONAL AMERICAN BANK.

Mr. BACON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 5029) to carry into effect the recommendations of the International American Conference, by the incorporation of the international American bank; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Rhode Island.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the further consideration of the report of the Committee on Rules.

Mr. BUTLER. If it is only two or three, I am willing that it should go on.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Rhode Island has been recognized, and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. BUTLER] demands the regular order, which is the further consideration of the report of the Committee on Rules.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. PAYNE. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moves that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 51 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, January 30, 1892.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. The Chaplain, Rev. WILLIAM H. MILBURN, D. D., offered the following prayer:

God of our fathers, we bless Thee for the long line of noteworthy and patriotic men that, from Congress to Congress, have entered these halls, and by whose labors and counsel the mighty edifice of our state has been erected, a government that has risen to majestic proportions, the sight whereof is gladness to the world. Men pass, but the Government remains and grows in its glory. Their sons rise up to serve the States and do their memory honor.

We are here to weave, as in a wreath, the tribute of our respect, memory, and affection for a man who answered to the roll call of the House less than a year ago, cut off untimely before half the afternoon of his life was spent; a man of rich qualities, that made him racy of the soil in the beautiful land where he was born and bred, to whose service and welfare his life was supremely devoted; a man of instinct, of energy, diligent in all his labors, unwearied in activity, fearless in courage, dauntless in conflict, firm and steadfast in friendship, a man who wrought himself into the affectionate trust and confidence of his constituents, by his convictions and principles in sympathy with their own, as few men have done. Grant, O Lord, that the lesson of our mortality may come home to every man's heart and conscience, and may we be impressed with the truth that ere long the Son of Man shall call for us to render our account at the judgment seat. Give us Thy grace that we all may be ready, and so come to join the innumerable company on Thy right hand in Heaven. We pray through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

SAN JOAQUIN RIVER, CALIFORNIA.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a letter from the officers in charge of the office of the Chief of Engineers, with its inclosures, relative to the improvement of the San Joaquin River, California, pursuant to resolution which passed the House of Representatives January 25, 1892; which was referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, Mr. SCOTT was granted leave of absence for ten days, on account of important business.

LEAVE TO WITHDRAW PAPERS.

Mr. ALDERSON, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of William H. Gillespie.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. BLAND, on behalf of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, asked that the subcommittee of that committee have leave to have printed testimony and hearings had before it respecting the free coinage of silver.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

CHARGES AGAINST JUDGE BOARMAN.

Mr. OATES. Mr. Speaker, I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary to ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the desk, and which is reported as a substitute for the resolution of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BOATNER] referred to the committee.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Whereas Aleck Boarman, judge of the United States district court for the western district of the State of Louisiana, was charged in the House of Representatives of the Fifty-first Congress with high crimes and misdemeanors, alleged to have been committed by him as such judge; and

Whereas the Committee on the Judiciary, under the authority of said House, investigated the alleged official misconduct in office of the said judge, and took a considerable volume of testimony thereon, both against said judge and for him, he being present in person or by his counsel whenever and wherever the said testimony was taken; and

Whereas, upon due consideration thereof, the said committee reported a resolution to the said House of Represenatives, declaring that said Judge Boarman should be impeached of high crimes and misdemeanors in office, and accompanying the said resolution was the evidence upon which the same was based, which was duly printed under the direction of said committee and by order of the House; and

Whereas the said resolution never came to a vote, and hence never was adopted by said House for the lack of time to duly consider the same: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the said report, charges, and evidence be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions to thoroughly investigate the same, and to report to the House the findings and recommendations in regard thereto at any time.

And for the purpose of making the investigation hereby ordered, the said Committee on the Judiciary may adopt and use as legal evidence the testimony taken as aforesaid during the Fifty-first Congress in the case of Judge Boarman, and may take and consider any additional or explanatory evidence of a legal character which may be offered either for or against the said judge; and in respect to this investigation the said committee is hereby authorized and empowered to send for persons and papers, administer oaths, take testimony, and to employ a clerk and stenographer, if necessary; to send a subcommittee whenever and wherever deemed necessary to take testimony for the use of said committee; and the said subcommittee, while so employed, shall have the same powers in respect to obtaining testimony as are herein given to said Committee on the Judiciary; that the Sergeant-at-Arms, by himself or deputy, shall serve the process of said committee and subcommittee and execute its orders, and shall attend the sittings of the same as ordered and directed thereby; and that the expense of such investigation shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. OATES. Mr. Speaker, the object of the substitute reported by the Judiciary Committee is simply to enable that committee to make the investigation contemplated, because I believe every member of the committee, upon the slight examination which has been given to the evidence, thinks this is a case which ought to be investigated.

The question being taken on the resolution reported by the Judiciary Committee as a substitute, it was agreed to; and, by unanimous consent, the original resolution was laid on the table.

FISHERIES.

Mr. LAPHAM, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 5030) to regulate the fisheries, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, and ordered to be printed.

SETTLERS ON NORTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD LANDS.

Mr. REILLY. The Committee on the Pacific Railroads, to which was referred House bill No. 224, with the accompanying petition, have directed me to report it back with a request that this committee be discharged from the further consideration of the subject, and that the bill and petition be referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

There being no objection, the Committee on the Pacific Railroads was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 224) to amend chapter 1258, entitled "An act for the relief of settlers on Northern Pacific Railroad indemnity lands," approved October 1, 1890; and the same was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. DAVIS obtained the floor and said: I desire unanimous consent to introduce a bill.

Mr. REED. Before that request is put, I ask unanimous consent that members of the House, during the day, may have the privilege of presenting bills for reference, to be referred under the direction of the Speaker, as in the Fifty-first Congress.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine asks unanimous consent that during the day Representatives may be permitted to introduce bills, as was the practice in the Fifty-first Congress, by submitting them to the Speaker for reference by him. Is there objection?

Mr. BLAND. I object, and my reason for objecting is that the Speaker did not properly refer bills in the Fifty-first Congress.

Mr. REED. I hope the gentleman from Missouri does not mean to insinuate that the present Speaker would follow the evil example of any predecessor.

Mr. BLAND. I know there were two or three days—— [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I renew the request, because we have not got the same Speaker we had in the last Congress.

Mr. REED. I can not hear the gentlemen.

POST-OFFICE BUILDINGS.

The SPEAKER. The House will please be in order. The Chair will endeavor to recognize all gentlemen who have bills to introduce. The Clerk will report the title of the bill presented by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. DAVIS].

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill to authorize the erection of post-office buildings, and for other purposes.

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. 5031) was introduced, read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WALKER. I call for the regular order.

Mr. HEARD and others. What is the regular order?

The SPEAKER. Unless the report of the Committee on Rules is called up, the Chair is not informed as to what the regular order is. There being no regular code of rules——

Mr. WALKER. Let us go on with the consideration of the rules of the House.

Mr. REED. I submit that the unfinished business must have preference.

Mr. WALKER. These various bills can be introduced without taking up the time of the House. If objection is made to the proposition of the gentleman from Maine, I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed that the report of the Committee on Rules has not been called up this morning because there is a special order fixed for 1 o'clock, the memorial services in regard to a deceased member, Mr. Houk. It was not deemed wise to call up the report of the Committee on Rules for so short a period.

Mr. WALKER. I think we may as well spend the time upon the rules as waste it in this way.

Mr. ANDREW. Wasting time when we are doing business! The only way to reach business is through the introduction of bills.

Mr. WALKER. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the unfinished business——

Mr. CATCHINGS. If gentlemen insist on the regular order, I move that the House take a recess until 1 o'clock.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the unfinished business would be the report of the Committee on Rules. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CATCHINGS] moves that the House take a recess until 1 o'clock.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I wish to say that I only made the motion provided gentlemen on the other side insist on the regular order.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. CATCHINGS for a recess, it was not agreed to.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I hope the House will permit bills to be introduced.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the unfinished business, being the report of the Committee on Rules.

Mr. DICKERSON. I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I understand that there is an amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] which has not yet been acted on.

The SPEAKER. It has not been. The Clerk will report the pending amendment.

Mr. BUSHNELL. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state with reference to the pending business that there are two amendments to the report of the Committee on Rules which have not been acted upon.

Mr. BUSHNELL. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BUSHNELL. I wish to ask whether or not the gentleman from Mississippi, in charge of the report from the Committee on Rules, has not the right to waive the calling of it up to-day, so that we may proceed with the introduction of bills?

The SPEAKER. The regular order having been demanded, the unfinished business is necessarily the further consideration of the report of the Committee on Rules.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I move that the further consideration of the report of the Committee on Rules be postponed until Monday morning next, after the reading of the Journal.

The question was taken.

Mr. BUCHANAN of New Jersey. I demand a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 129, noes 18.

Mr. BUCHANAN of New Jersey. No quorum.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will appoint tellers.

Mr. BUCHANAN of New Jersey and Mr. CATCHINGS were appointed tellers.

The House proceeded to divide, but before the result was announced——

Mr. BUCHANAN of New Jersey said: Mr. Speaker, it being evident that the party which has more than two-thirds of this House has not a quorum present, I relent. [Laughter.]

So (no further count being demanded) the motion of Mr. CATCHINGS was agreed to.

Mr. CALDWELL. I renew the point of order——

Mr. BURROWS. I move to reconsider the vote by which the report of the Committee on Rules was postponed until Monday next.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 128, noes 0.

Mr. BURROWS. No quorum.

Mr. McMILLIN. I demand the yeas and nays on the motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 182, nays 27, not voting 122; as follows:

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Mr. KILGORE, is detained from the House on account of sickness.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

DEATH OF HON. L. C. HOUK.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read from the RECORD the special order fixed for to-day.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Resolved, That Saturday, January 30, beginning at 1 o'clock p. m., be set apart for paying tribute to the memory of Hon. Leonidas Campbell Houk, late a member of the House of Representatives from the Second district of the State of Tennessee."

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I offer the resolutions I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the business of the House be now suspended, that opportunity may be given for tributes to the memory of Hon. Leonidas Campbell Houk, late a member from the State of Tennessee.

Resolved, As a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, and in recognition of his eminent abilities as a distinguished public servant, that the House, at the conclusion of these memorial proceedings, shall stand adjourned.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, Death stands sentinel, grim and inexorable, hostile and implacable, on the boundary line of the unknown. There is no countersign, no password, for he is a foe to all who come, and all must come. His only command is "Halt!" In this stern word is the authority of God's decree, the infrangible seal of Fate! From obedience there is no escape, from that seal there is no exemption; for clemency there is no bribe, no parley, no persuasion. Time can grant no procrastination, no respite, eternity urge no argument. The Court of Heaven hears no appeal, grants no stay.

The Angel Mercy pleads in vain. His fell stroke must descend upon all flesh. The voice of merit but invites his aim, the brightness of virtue only attracts his arrow. Infancy and youth wither and fade as the severed violet, the plucked rose. Manhood, womanhood, rich with the ripeness of mature years, falls as the laden fruit tree uprooted in the full season of its fruitage. Age bows and crashes to earth like the decayed and storm-riven oak. Time is the pale harvest field of death, the world is his charnel house, and the history of the race is but the record of his mournful tragedies. When kindred and companions, friends and comrades, fall around us, love, grief, and tears bid us suspend for a season the cares and occupations of life and yield to them the last tribute of the heart's best incense.

In the death of my late colleague, the Hon. Leonidas C. Houk, the State of Tennessee has lost one of her most distinguished citizens, the Republican party one of its ablest leaders, and the Second Congressional district a zealous and devoted Representative and guardian of every interest of its people.

Judge Houk was born the 8th day of June, 1836, in a log cabin among the mountains of Sevier County, East Tennessee. His early life was passed in poverty and obscurity, unattended with educational advantages. But he was endowed with no ordinary mind. Nature had bestowed upon him rare intellectual powers which would not brook the restraints and fetters of adversity. He was reënforced with an aspiring ambition and an indomitable will which were destined to conquer opposing circumstances and create opportunities.

He caught the inspiration of his native mountains. To him every gorge and pass symbolized an intellectual Thermopylæ with its triumph, and every towering peak a scaling ladder to the heights of light and liberty!

At an early age he learned the trade of cabinet-maker; and it was while engaged in this avocation he developed an insatiable thirst for knowledge and those liberal acquirements which would enable him to rise in the world. For several years he consumed the day in toil and half the night in study. I have heard him frequently assert that three months would cover the entire period of his attendance at school. Having thus acquired, without a teacher, a fair English education, he next undertook the study of law, and by the same process and without the aid of a tutor, mastered its principles. He was at length admitted to the bar and immediately entered the practice. He soon took rank among the foremost jurists of the country, and became noted as an advocate without a superior in his State.

In the Presidential campaign of 1860 he made his first appearance in politics, when he entered the lists for Bell and Everett, on the platform of "the Union, the Constitution, and the enforcement of the laws." In 1861, pending the passage of the ordinance of secession, he was a delegate to two memorable Union conventions, now historical in our State, one held at Knoxville in May of that year and the other at Greeneville in the following June. The purpose of these conventions was to protest against the ordinance of secession, and he suggested and urged bold and aggressive measures for the prevention of that fatal step which afterwards brought disaster upon Tennessee and the South.

In 1864 he was on Lincoln and Johnson's electoral ticket. In 1865 he was elected a member of the constitutional convention which reorganized the State government. He served as a delegate to the Chicago convention of 1868 which nominated Gen. Grant for President. With but one exception he has taken part in every succeeding national convention, and in that of 1880 was one of the famous 306 who stood firm and voted to the last for Gen. Grant's nomination for a third term.

At the breaking out of the civil war, and just as he was entering a lucrative law practice, he volunteered in the Union Army and was soon promoted to the colonelcy of the Third Tennessee Infantry, and in this capacity rendered to his country honorable service. In 1866 he was chosen judge of his judicial circuit and served four years with distinction. In 1873 he was elected to the State Legislature, where he was at once recognized as the leader of his party, lacking only one vote of election as speaker in a Democratic house and against the Democratic caucus nominee. He was next triumphantly elected, after a prolonged struggle, to the Forty-sixth Congress, and was afterwards elected consecutively to the Forty-seventh, Forty-eighth, Forty-ninth, Fiftieth, Fifty-first, and Fifty-second Congresses.

In this long career in the House he was always recognized as a faithful Representative and an able and conscientious legislator. Diligent, energetic, active, aggressive, and vigilant, he was a conspicuous figure in every Congress of which he was a member. He stood as a champion of the people, and his voice was heard on every question involving or affecting their sacred rights and interests. His love of his country was coextensive with its boundaries, and its growth, prosperity, peace, and welfare were ever the paramount objects of his hope and labors.

He was magnanimous and forgiving. He knew not how to cultivate hatred or to perpetuate enmity in his heart. Though a staunch Unionist from the first day of the civil war, joining in the struggle as a Federal soldier, and during its course was embittered with all the terrible animosities of that stormy and perilous period, yet at its conclusion he was among the first to cast aside and forget those animosities and to hold out the olive branch. And when, after the close of hostilities, the Confederates of Tennessee, as a result of the war, were temporarily deprived of the right of suffrage, he was the first Unionist of East Tennessee to publicly advocate their restoration to the elective franchise and to all the rights of citizenship.

He was not exempt from the frailties of our common humanity. He had his faults—who has them not?—wounding himself rather than others; but his virtues plead for them as the roses plead for the thorns they cover. As we crave the charity of our fellow men for our own faults, so let us cheerfully and lovingly drop its gracious mantle over his, remembering only his virtues.

Steadfast in his principles, firm in his convictions, unwavering in his faith, fearless and eloquent in the advocacy of any cause he espoused, forceful and incisive in argument, he was a formidable antagonist in debate; yet by his manly and courteous demeanor and his fair treatment of the question at issue he always won and retained the confidence and respect of his adversary.

He was an indefatigable worker; he never ate idle bread; his success in life rested upon the merits of honest and persistent toil coupled with unusual mental powers. A child of poverty and obscurity, a common laborer on a farm, an apprentice, a tradesman, a student without a tutor, self-taught and self-supported, rising step by step by his own unaided efforts to the profession of law, to the dignity of the judicial ermine, to honorable position in the military service, to high political preferments as a statesman of recognized ability, to the noble and enviable distinction of a useful and universally respected citizen, his career presents one of the most striking illustrations of the possibilities offered to men under our institutions and our system of government.

In the life and career of this distinguished American statesman and citizen we recognize the glorious fact that here the foot of the ladder rests; not on the higher level (there are no higher levels), but on the common level of mankind; that the humblest, the poorest, the most obscure may climb to the top, and that the divine right to rule inheres not in the few, but the many; not in descent, but in merit; not in blood, but in brains!

"Green grow the grass above his grave," and ever fresh and green be his memory in the hearts of his countrymen. [Applause.]

Mr. ENLOE. Mr. Speaker, the only compensation for the brevity of human life is the hope of immortality. Life is a boon unsought and death a mystery unsolved, except by faith. To-day we are zealously pursuing our cherished plans and eagerly pressing forward to some earthly goal where hope whispers we shall find happiness. To-morrow death enters, the unfinished life-work is laid aside, the busy hands are folded, the tired brain rests, and words of praise and of censure alike fail to stir the pulseless heart. We have seen many of our colleagues, who entered this theater of political strife and patriotic endeavor, seeking a deathless fame, through self-sacrifice and devotion to public duty, go hence to answer the mysterious summons.

In the presence of death how pitiful the passions, how delusive the hopes, how insignificant the aims of men appear. When one dies who has done his public duty as best he could, and has made enemies as he must in doing it, the fashion of the times is either to pay just tribute too long withheld to him who can not receive it, or, as if to cancel the debt perforce, to overbalance the account with fulsome eulogy. More kindness for the living and less praise for the dead would better square the account with conscience. It is not any more the legitimate province of those who pronounce funeral orations here or elsewhere to indulge in exaggerated praise of the virtues of the dead than it would be to criticise their shortcomings, or to censure their faults. The story of a man's life is his best eulogy. My acquaintance with my late colleague, Judge Houk, dates back to 1873, but I never knew him until the beginning of the Fiftieth Congress.

To the story of his life so eloquently told by his neighbor and colleague [Mr. TAYLOR] I could add nothing, except my personal tribute to the manly qualities he always exhibited in his official and personal intercourse with me.

Differing with him in politics and being a comparative stranger to him personally, I candidly confess that I had not understood his real character, and that I met him with a certain degree of prejudice and distrust. He was a man who neither gave nor asked quarter in the heat of conflict.

His convictions were positive, his language was always vigorous and emphatic, and when he entered the arena of debate he aimed at the vital points; but when the political gladiators met in social intercourse after the conflict was over, he was always genial and kind, and he was generous enough to forget that blows had been given and received.

I always found him ready and willing to hear the reasons in support of measures brought to his attention, and when he gave a promise to help he kept it. He admired a bold and manly opposition, and the stronger and more aggressive his political antagonist the greater his admiration for him. He was devoted to the people who gave him such loyal support. Coming from the ranks of the masses, having struggled upward unaided, he knew the hearts of the common people, and always kept in touch with them.

No member ever watched over local matters and promoted the personal interests of his constituents with greater vigilance than he did. He had bound them to him with a thousand ties, and when I stood beside his bier at his home in Knoxville, Tenn., and looked upon the thousands of people of all classes, who came from all parts of his district to place a flower or to drop a tear upon his grave, I was more than ever convinced that he occupied the highest place in the affections of his people.

Sharp and often bitter as the political conflicts had been in his district he had endeared himself personally to many of his political opponents, and they joined with his political friends in paying their silent tribute of respect to his memory.

There may be little significance in the crowds that follow the triumphant leader to celebrate a victory, but when multitudes turn out to follow the dead leader whose hand holds no rewards to distribute among his followers, it is the heartfelt eulogy of a grateful people.

Judge Houk demonstrated more elements of successful leadership than any man of his party in Tennessee, and during his life I always regarded him as its ablest leader.

The estimate of his abilities among his colleagues on this floor was always high, and on all occasions his public utterances justified that estimate. He was justly regarded as the ablest Representative of his party in Congress from the South.

His death was an irreparable loss to his party in Tennessee and a great loss to his party here, and it was a personal loss to every one who knew the value of his friendship. The bereaved family have our profound sympathy in their affliction.

The resurrection is the silver lining to the dark clouds of death, and we know the sun is shining beyond.

'Tis immortality—'tis that alone—
Amid life's pains, abasements, emptiness,
The soul can comfort, elevate, and fill
That only, and that amply, this performs.

Mr. WASHINGTON. Mr. Speaker, on the 25th day of May, 1891, in the prime of life, in the full vigor of manhood, in the midst of an active and useful career as a member of this House, Leonidas Campbell Houk was accidentally and suddenly stricken down by the remorseless hand of Death. Lacking but fourteen days of having completed fifty-five years of life, he had crowded a century of work into that period of time. His proud spirit brooked no restraint. His wonderful energy never tired.

Of poor and obscure parentage, he had neither riches nor influential friends to push his fortunes; but by an indomitable will worked out his own education, carved out his own career. From the humble barefoot plow boy in homespun breeches, he became, in turn, advocate, soldier, jurist, politician, legislator, and statesman in that rapid and unimpeded succession which genius can alone command. His life affords us one of the most striking exemplifications of the fact so often asserted that to the American youth, regardless of the accident of birth and of family, the highest honors are accessible, and that merit alone can command success. Born and reared in East Tennessee, amid those beautiful mountains whose green tops stand forever wreathed in fleecy clouds, his ardent nature took much of its coloring from his early surroundings.

The frugal fare and the unconfined life of the wild nature about him, dominated only by the fierce conflict of the elements, made him from boyhood an ardent lover of liberty and a stubborn foe to slavery.

When the civil war began he naturally took his stand on the side of the Union with his accustomed zeal and force. When the war cloud had passed and peace was restored his hand and voice were ever ready to defend the unfortunate. A bitter partisan in politics where his party principles were at stake, he never allowed party feeling to warp his judgment in a matter where individual rights were concerned, and in him those Southern war claimants whose cause was just ever found a faithful friend and advocate.

An intense Republican from honest conviction, he never pretended to what he did not believe. Fierce in denunciation of political wrongdoing, he never posed in the pharisaical rôle of "I am holier than thou," so common, alas, with many to-day. When he gave his promise to a political adversary in this House it could be absolutely relied upon. So that though he fought hard, he always fought honorably. In debate he was strong, in repartee he was to be feared. A quaint humor marked many a savage thrust. His course in this House was characterized by a diligence, tact, and unfailing courtesy which brought him into most agreeable relations with his colleagues.

To his party in Tennessee and in the South he was a well-nigh irreparable loss. Courageous, aggressive, effective, and sturdy. His friends loved, his enemies had cause to fear him. Had his party more leaders of his character, caliber, and potency its influence in the South would be greater. Some one has well said of him, "To the superior quality of Republicanism in his State, Judge Houk contributed by zealous and constant endeavor."

His efforts in that commendable direction were never more earnest than at national conventions. With splendid eloquence and withering scorn he exposed and denounced the wretched creatures who, while acting as delegates, make merchandise of their votes. The corruption of the Southern delegates at national Republican conventions has been a crying abuse ever since the second candidacy of Gen. Grant. To abate or suppress the evil was Judge Houk's laudable ambition and desire. While he never succeeded in eradicating the wrong, he did much to modify its effects. Politics in his State and in the country at large was the better by reason of his connection with it. His departure will be mourned sincerely by his constituents in the State which gave "Old Hickory" to the nation, and conferred upon it in after years the striking personalities of Andrew Johnson and "Parson" Brownlow. Sorrow for his untimely and tragic death will extend beyond geographical and party lines, and even his bitterest partisan adversary will not hesitate to lay a token of remembrance upon his grave.

Mr. HENDERSON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, for twelve years I had the honor of serving as a member of this body with the late Hon. Leonidas C. Houk, of the State of Tennessee, and it was with deep sorrow and regret that I heard of his death, and of the sad circumstances under which it occurred.

Judge Houk represented the Congressional district in the State of Tennessee in which he was born in the Forty-sixth, Forty-seventh, Forty-eighth, Forty-ninth, Fiftieth, and Fifty-first Congresses, and was elected in November, 1890, a member of the Fifty-second Congress, but died from accidental poisoning on the 26th of May last at his home in Knoxville before taking his seat, deeply lamented by his constituents and friends who had honored him by seven successive elections as a member of this body.

Mr. Speaker, there is no better illustration of the character of our country and its institutions and of the possibilities presented to the American youth than is found in the life of Judge Houk, to whose memory we pay tribute to-day. Born in a cabin, of poor parents, so far as this world's goods are concerned, he was left fatherless at the age of 3 years, and when old enough, was placed at work on a farm. Still this boy of pluck and energy worked his way up in life, studied law while supporting himself by the labor of his own hands, was admitted to the bar in the twenty-third year of his age, and at once became a successful lawyer. At the age of 24 years he entered the political arena and took the stump in the Presidential campaign of 1860 for Bell and Everett, on a platform which declared in favor of "the Union, the Constitution, and the enforcement of the laws."

At the age of twenty-five he was already widely known in East Tennessee, and, arraying himself on the side of the Union, he took a conspicuous part in the discussion which preceded the civil war. He was a prominent member of Union conventions held at Knoxville and at Greeneville, Tenn., in 1861, in which he declared himself firmly and unalterably opposed to secession, and in August of the same year he abandoned his profession and entered the service of his country as a soldier; a service in which he rose to the command of a regiment and rendered gallant service, for he was a man of courage and of earnest, ardent patriotism.

Mr. Speaker, having served as a soldier in the war for the preservation of the Union in East Tennessee, and in the county in which Judge Houk was born, and having been associated with the soldiers of East Tennessee much of the time during my service, I will say in this connection that there were no people in any section of our country more loyal to the Union than were the great body of the people of East Tennessee, nor were there any soldiers in the Union Army more brave, gallant, and patriotic than were the soldiers of the same section. I have sometimes thought there was something in the very air of the mountains and valleys of East Tennessee which made the people who inhabited them loyal to the Government of their fathers.

At one time I sent two hundred men of my regiment under Gen. Sanders, in what was known as the Sanders' raid, into East Tennessee, and on their return I asked one of the men how they found the people in East Tennessee, whether loyal to the Union or not. He replied, "So loyal, Colonel, that you could feel it in the atmosphere as soon as you got into the State."

Compelled to leave the service on account of ill-health, after serving nearly two years, he resumed the practice of his profession; but in 1865 he was elected a member of the constitutional convention which reorganized the State government of the State of Tennessee.

In 1866 he was elected judge of the circuit court of the seventeenth judicial circuit, which office he held for four years. But he was more inclined to political life, and in 1872 was elected a member of the State Legislature, and in 1878, as I have already stated, was elected a Representative of this body; and held that office until the day of his death.

What a noble example the life of Judge Houk furnishes to the young men of the country who are of humble birth and fortune.

But, Mr. Speaker, it is not my purpose in speaking of the life and character of Judge Houk to occupy the attention of the House but a few moments; and I must leave to others the duty of speaking more particularly of the distinguished services which as a Representative in Congress he rendered to his constituents and the country.

I will, however, say that Judge Houk was an able and faithful Representative, and during his long service as such took a prominent part in the proceedings of Congress, and was ever watchful and zealous in looking after the interests of his constituents and of his State. I well remember with what great earnestness he urged liberal appropriations to improve the rivers of East Tennessee, and with what pride he spoke of the great benefits which his constituents derived from their improvement. Being a native of the State of Tennessee, I was, perhaps, on that account early brought into close and friendly relations with him after he became a member of the House, and serving on a committee which had in charge the improvement of rivers and harbors, he often appealed to me earnestly as a Tennesseean to see that the water ways of his State were not permitted to suffer for the want of necessary appropriations to improve them.

But Judge Houk, while he loved his native State, her mountains, her valleys, and her beautiful rivers, and rejoiced in her prosperity, was a broad-minded Representative, as broad in his nationality and in his patriotism as the boundaries of the entire country, and was neither narrow nor sectional in his legislative action. On the contrary, he earnestly desired and took the greatest possible pride in the prosperity of the whole country and of each and every section of it.

Judge Houk was an earnest, devoted Republican. He had an abiding faith in the party and its principles, and never for a moment in all my association with him did he falter in his loyalty to it, nor in his efforts to promote its success. In his defense of the party he gave his strongest, severest blows; but, Mr. Speaker, he was always honorable and manly, as he was always honest and sincere in his political convictions. When he died the Southern Republicans lost a bold, fearless, and able, if not their ablest, leader.

Mr. Speaker, it is well for us to cherish the memory of such men as Leonidas C. Houk. Speaking for myself to-day, with the feeling that I have lost a friend, I deeply deplore his death, and am sure that all of us who knew him warmly sympathize with his bereaved family, and with his constituents, who have lost an able Representative.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, according to a custom that has prevailed from time immemorial in this House, when one of our members has been removed by death, the public business of the state is suspended in order that the surviving members may pay just and proper tributes to the memory of the dead. We have assembled to-day, in accordance with the resolutions introduced by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. TAYLOR], for the purpose of paying the last sad tribute of humanity to the memory of one of our members. It was not my fortune to be intimately associated with the deceased member, Judge Houk, and I must, therefore, leave to gentlemen from his own State more intimately acquainted with him, and such as were brought into close relations with him, like my friend. Judge HENDERSON of Illinois, who has just so feelingly spoken of him, to spread upon the records of this House tribute to him as a citizen, a neighbor, and a friend. I will speak more especially of his public career, and of the temper and spirit in which he discharged the duties which devolved upon him in that capacity.

Death came to him, Mr. Speaker, with unusual suddenness. It never comes with unequivocal warning to any of us. Nowhere is there a more striking illustration of the suddenness with which it comes and can come to all mortals than in the case of the death of Judge Houk. In the fullness of ripened manhood, in the midst of a useful career, and in the city in which he lived, he was sick, I believe, for not more than twelve hours before death. It never comes except its tread be like those who tread on velvet, though its clutch be of iron. There is no warning to the man who is marked. No such warning came to the regal reveler when the unseen hand wrote on the wall, "Mene, mene, tekel, upharsin." It comes alike to all classes, all ranks, and all grades of humanity. The old Latin poet, whose classic words are familiar to most of us, properly described its approach in the memorable passage in which he says:

Pallida mors, æquo pulsat pede pauperum tabernas, regumque turres.

It passes none—the lofty and the humble are alike its objects. In this instance there has fallen a man whose public career has been remarkable. I never knew Judge Houk until I met him in these halls. He sat upon the opposite side of the Chamber. He was a Republican in principle. He was devoted to the principles of the party to which he belonged.

He was an earnest, honest, zealous partisan; always armed in defense of the cause which he believed to be right; and it remained with him, whether among his people at home, in that beautiful region of country that has been referred to by those who knew him better than I, amidst her mountains, or here. He always manifested that earnest strength of character, whether he stood amid his own native mountains, sometimes glassed in sunshine, sometimes covered with shadow, and sometimes the home of the storm god, or whether he stood here in this oftentime tumultuous Chamber; he stood up politically with the courage of his convictions for the principles to which he was endeared. He was emphatically a partisan—a partisan deeply devoted to the principles he believed to be right; and I do not mean to say that he was less a patriot because he was a partisan. In his career as a public man, in the defense of the principles he believed to be right; in his conduct in this House of Representatives, he reminded me of the character of those stern men who followed the lead of the great republican, Cromwell, in England, who, whether in conventicle, church, or state, were always armed cap-a-pie for the cause to which they were endeared and the leader whom they followed.

He sprung, as has been said by his comrades, from the humbler walks of life. I believe he was admitted to the bar when only 23 years of age. He at once took high rank among the members of the profession at a bar where such men as Judge John and Horace Maynard and other men of equal ability were accustomed to practice. When the war between the States came on, following his convictions, he became, first a private soldier, enlisting in one of the companies raised in his own county, and in a short time afterwards was made colonel of the Third Infantry Regiment from Tennessee. He served until 1863, when his health required that he should leave the Army.

After the war was over, he became a member of the convention of Tennessee, which was intended and designed to restore her to the Union—one of those conventions to rehabilitate the States after the war was over. He saw, in common with other sensible men of their region of country, that there could be no rehabilitation that was not predicated on the consent of the people who were to be governed; and therefore that it must be a rehabilitation of the Union upon that great and immortal principle, declared by the Supreme Court of the United States in that memorable case that afterward went to it, in which they made the declaration "that, while this is an indissoluble Union, it is yet composed of indestructible States."

He was a member of that memorable convention that restored Tennessee to the Union, and soon after he came here as a member of this House. I was here when he came. I watched his course during the whole time that he was in Congress, save the period when I myself was not here, and in every instance he manifested an earnest, outspoken, and zealous advocacy of the principles which he believed to be right. He took conspicuous rank in this body. The House contained then, as always, many gentlemen who had had the advantages of a splendid education, both in the common schools of the country and in its colleges and universities, yet in debate he was strong and powerful and took high rank among them, although he had had only the advantages of a common-school education, and that in a region of country where, from the sparsity of the population and the infrequency with which the schools were kept open, he could attend school for only two or three months during the year.

Though he was, as has been said, a laborer upon the farm, and a laborer as a mechanic, he conceived the idea of entering the profession of the law, and was indebted to a kindly gentleman, Hon. O. P. Temple, who lived in his immediate neighborhood, for the loan of the books which enabled him to master at night, by a pine-torch light, that wonderfully intricate profession and become prominent in it. But it was toward political life that he had the strongest tendency, and, as I have already said, he took rank here with men who had had superior advantages to those which he had enjoyed.

He was at school but a very short time; he was his own educator, his own teacher; but he developed into a man of remarkable strength and power in this House. He was a member, and I believe that in the Forty-seventh Congress he was chairman, of the Committee on Elections, one of the most important committees of this House. He also served upon other committees of the House, and always with ability and fidelity to the trust which was reposed in him. Despite the slimness of the educational advantages which he had enjoyed, he developed into a man of mark, as was evidenced by the fact that he never at any time failed to command the support of the district which, for so many long years, he represented in this House; and had he lived until the end of the term, which has now devolved upon his son, he would have been for fourteen years consecutively a member of the House of Representatives.

He has left his mark upon the statutes that have been enacted into law during the time he served here. He has left his mark amongst the people in the midst of whom he lived, and who knew him best, as a man of wonderful energy, of great enthusiasm, and of a disposition to stand up at all times and in all places and speak the honest convictions of his mind. I take great pleasure, sir, in paying this, my very humble tribute, in common with other members, to the memory of our deceased brother.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, in 1882 it was my privilege to first know Judge Houk. My first meeting with him made me his friend, a friendship that continued and strengthened until his death.

In estimating the character of men after they have gone, the opportunities that they may have had in life should be, it seems to me, one of the leading elements that should enter into consideration. Many men in their youth have the advantages of wealth and the earnest appeals and support of potential parents and friends to secure for them education and advancement. Throughout this country, now grown rich, how many homes there are where untiring efforts are being put forth by men of ample means to give their sons collegiate education and other high training, and yet how many of those young men seem to be entirely indifferent to their opportunities.

And, sir, while that is true, and the sons of great men are being turned down by the plowshare of time, the wheel seemingly turning so that the giants of to-day seldom leave in their children true representatives of their own power—while that, I say, is true, how often does it happen that from some simple corner of the country, some little nook of earth, in a quiet farm home, in a little woodland lot in the forest, or in some mechanic's simple, honest home, is being formed a powerful, conquering mind which almost from birth has to grapple with poverty and to fight a brave battle for all the knowledge which it obtains. And yet such are the men that turn out the Websters and Lincolns, and such are the men that represent the great surging activities of life. I sometimes think that no greater curse can fall to the lot of a boy than wealth, and that the greatest blessing for a child is to have poverty and an honest parentage.

The subject of our thoughts this afternoon was born to poverty, but he was cradled in the arms of honesty. Think of the picture! Left fatherless at 3, only three months in the public schools, yet we find him as a little boy seated, with his cheap taper, away far into the nighttime, reading, reading, reading. Ah, what a school was there for such a mind as his! I see that some one in speaking of him says, that "he was an omniverous reader." I suppose it is meant by that that he read almost everything, good or bad. You can not have a truly skillful physician unless he knows the good and the bad, health and disease. He was an omniverous reader; but he who ever sat down for a cozy hour with Judge Houk soon found out that he had drawn inspiration from the grandest interpreters of the human heart—the poets. He had lived much in the company of those gifted men and women who fill our homes with romance; those who, kindred to the poets, live in the clouds, so to speak, but can not carry you to the clouds unless they have been in the dark places of earth, at least in honest, earnest thought.

To sympathize with poverty one must have tasted of its stern realities. To comprehend the needs of the toilers of earth one must have been under the whip of necessity and felt his every muscle strained to secure the needed things of life. The poet and the novelist must first taste of life's realities before they can interpret the wonderful longings of the human soul. Judge Houk had been much with such poets and such novelists, and few men with whom I have conversed showed a larger knowledge of the historians.

It is true he had no diploma; he never attended a college or university; and we may say that he was a stranger to the public school; but he had the training which comes from honest work, earnest action, deep thought, and real experience. Viewed in the light of those opportunities, I think that great credit is due to the man who, working on the farm and in the shop, without a tutor, is found admitted to the bar at the age of 24, a colonel soon after, a judge on the bench at 26, and a potential leader of men from his early manhood until death retired him from life's busy, useful field of action.

His lines of thought and study and the tendencies of his own warm and hopeful heart and mind made him, in my judgment, an orator. You may not all agree with me in that view. Some may measure oratory by the rules laid down by the schools. Judge Houk's oratory was not manufactured. It was that kind of oratory that comes from the sounding sea and the thrilling voices of nature. He gathered it from the clouds, the mountains, and from human heartbeats. It was perhaps rugged and unpolished; but who ever saw Judge Houk rise on this floor who was not at once held and thrilled by his earnest, honest, burning words? He was an orator, and he was a debater too. He had, Mr. Speaker, that wonderful gift of striking down an adversary and at the same instant making him his friend. Few men can kill the body and not wound the soul. This man could do it.

In many of his attributes he reminded me strikingly of Mr. Lincoln. A story is told—and a true one—how when Lincoln was working in a little store in Illinois his great size and physical strength attracted the hatred of some bully in the vicinity—a giant in his way, who had given out that he was going to thrash this young Kentuckian. Abe had heard of it a good many times, but paid no attention to it. One day the bully came into the grocery store where Lincoln was lying stretched on the counter, upon his breast, reading a book. The bully came in and began to talk in an ugly, threatening way. Finally Lincoln raised himself, closed his book, and said, "I suppose I have got to thrash you; and I may as well do it at once." They went out, and were soon closed in physical conflict. The young Kentuckian soon threw the bully to the ground, rolled him in the mud, and, pulling up a handful of smartweed, rubbed it into the eyes of his opponent until he roared. Instantly the simple son of the woods of Kentucky hastened for a bucket of water, and with his own handkerchief sponged out the pain from the eyes of his adversary. It is a simple, rude story; but it is a story showing a characteristic of great hearts and great minds. And just such a character and heart had Leonidas C. Houk.

As a stumper he was greater than as an orator or debater, although both of these qualities were utilized by him on the hustings. When he came before the people of his district then his power was truly seen and felt. His humor, his kindness, his large knowledge of history and of human experiences, especially among the poor, made him an irresistible power. Perhaps no man who has ever occupied a seat on this floor was more tenderly, truly, and enthusiastically followed by his constituents than Judge Houk. And one of the great secrets of this was that he was always approachable to all the people. No other man in his district could be more freely approached and counseled with and talked to by the poorest of the people than Judge Houk. To learn of trouble was to command all of his powers to serve and dispel it.

He is dead; and when he was carried to his last resting place, Tennessee turned out to carry him there. On the day of his funeral the city of his residence was crowded, as we are faithfully told by every class of citizens; and as in the affectionate eulogies here to-day, from both sides of this Chamber, there was at that funeral no North, no South, no East, no West, but his countrymen were there to shed tears over his bier. Resolutions of sorrow were passed by the Grand Army of the Republic, by the bar of his State, and by many Republican organizations. Tributes of respect and admiration came from every hand, and to-day the Congress of the greatest nation on earth suspends all its business to pay homage to his memory.

The true historian must not paint the subject which he delineates with sunlight only. Judge Houk's nature had its lights and its shadows. He had his strong qualities, and he had his weak ones. But the shadows of his character fell only on himself, while the sunlight of his nature poured forth upon all who knew him, warming the hearts that came within his genial influence. If he had faults they were like those described by a tender writer when referring to the character of Robert Burns; they were faults that "leaned to virtue's side." They poured out of the great storehouse of his big warm heart and social nature.

I will add nothing more except to say that I profoundly regret his going, and that his achievements can be pointed to as an example for the young men of the country, an example worthy of imitation, if they would rise from obscurity and win a powerful place in the councils of their countrymen.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. Speaker, grand are the mountains of East Tennessee. Their peaks and ridges mark the line of the land of the skies. The air there is soft and pure. The blue haze around them mellows their grandeur and adds to their charm. Well did the Indians name them Chilhowie (beautiful smoke). But there is substance with the charm. They are rich in material wealth. Ribbed with iron and veined with coal and marble, they are covered with timber firm in fiber and rare in quality. These mountains, however, are far richer in the spirit that quickened into being this mighty people, that has preserved their national life, and that has led to the development of their wealth and influence. They exhale the air of freedom.

Col. Benton once said "Truth comes from the sources of rivers." I say, the true spirit of liberty has always dwelt in the mountains. William Tell came from the Alps, Hofer slept on the cold slopes of the Tyrol, Owen Glendower's fires burned on the peaks of Snowden, and John of Ziska died in the mountain gorges of Bohemia.

Andorra, the oldest republic in the world, is cradled in the Pyrenees, San Marino sleeps in the Apennines, and Switzerland stands on its alpine gateway, the true sentinel of European freedom. This same spirit of liberty has a home in the mountains of East Tennessee. It animated the Creeks, Cherokees, and Chickasaws, ere they were forced from their mountain homes and driven across the Mississippi. It inspirited Shelby and Sevier, when descending from their cabins, like mountain lions, they fell upon Ferguson at King's Mountain. It nerved the loyalists of East Tennessee, when at Knoxville they repulsed Longstreet's famous assault.

Leonidas C. Houk was a true son of liberty. Born in the mountainous district of Tennessee, he breathed the pure air of freedom. The eagle that soared in the skies above him and the stag that paraded the leafy dells around him taught him self-reliance. Like Andrew Jackson and Abraham Lincoln, was he nurtured in poverty and schooled by adversity. He was the child of nature, tempered in the shadow of advancing civilization. Read the brief biographical sketch in the Congressional Directory. Concise, simple, admirable—a sketch that may well put the glow of hope into the eye of every American youth, however humble. Twenty-four lines, yet the epitome of the possibilities that await every waif in this great Republic.

The typical American youth of the olden time—barefoot, clad in Kentucky jean, linsey woolsey, or the product of the home spinning wheel, but with the fire of intellect in his eyes and a face indicating all the intuitions and aspirations of a boy born in the days of Andrew Jackson and Henry Clay. After three months instruction in an old-field school he becomes his own tutor. Andrew Johnson, then a tailor in a town not far away, had just learned to read and write under the tuition of his devoted wife. Abraham Lincoln, after a year of rail-splitting and his volunteer service in the Black Hawk war, had placed his feet upon the threshold of his eventful career. James A. Garfield was preaching in Campbellite churches after driving mules upon the towpath of an Ohio canal. Seated upon a low bench in the chimney corner of a log cabin, young Houk draws his knowledge from books conned by the light of flaming pine knots. He has a natural ingenuity which blossoms into cabinet-making. Yet, with the aspirations of an intellectual pioneer, he blazes his way into the domain of the law.

Blackstone, Coke, and Kent are digested while shoving his plane at the bench. He practices his profession less than two years when the war of the rebellion breaks out. In an instant his soul is aflame. Imbued with the unionism of Clay and the unswerving fidelity of Jackson he turns a deaf ear to the siren of secession. Imbued with the patriotism of Shelby and Sevier he loves not only his native State but the whole country, North and South, East and West. Upon the floor in the loyal convention of East Tennessee and in the field with deadly rifle he fights to preserve its autonomy and to perpetuate its grandeur and blessings. His native hills reëcho the roar of artillery in one of the world's great battles for freedom. Entering the Union Army as a private, within less than a year he wears the straps of a colonel.

Nor does his activity in behalf of his country cease with the war. As an editor he upheld the authority of that quaint-cut, but rare gem from the old mine of patriotism, William G. Brownlow. He does more than this. He becomes a member of the convention charged with amending the State constitution, and takes a leading part in the reorganization of the State government, and all his actions are tempered with magnanimity. Forgetting the peculiar ferocity that characterized the war in East Tennessee, his was the first voice raised on Tennessee soil in favor of the restoration of the Confederate soldier to the rights of citizenship.

The Union again thoroughly cemented, he is elected to the judicial bench. For four years is he the judge in the seventeenth circuit. Meantime, as a delegate to the national Republican convention, he favors the nomination for the Presidency of that illustrious and generous soldier, Ulysses S. Grant. Anon, elected as a Republican to the lower branch of the Tennessee Legislature, he receives a striking tribute from his associates. He comes within one vote of being elected speaker in a house strongly Democratic.

Mr. Houk was first elected to Congress thirteen years ago last November. From that time to the hour of his death this House was his home. His activity, industry, and ability were universally acknowledged. His integrity was unquestioned, his courage unchallenged. As rugged in character as his native hills, his spirit was as free as the mountain air. He was of the old school of statesmen, now, alas, rapidly passing away. He had the tenacity of Andrew Johnson, the iron will of Sevier, the fiery nature of Parson Brownlow, and the simplicity, courage, and commonsense of Davy Crockett. He was aggressive, yet magnanimous; fearless, but forbearing; unbending, yet generous; prophetic, yet reminiscent; overbearing, but tender; firm, yet genial; quaint, gritty, witty, and original. His arguments were direct and convincing, and there were windrows of logic in his oratory. His syllogisms were compact, his imagery iridescent, and his comparisons trite and delightful. He was quick and quaint at repartee, handling his tongue like a rapier. His aphorisms reflected the glow of his fervor, and his argument was replete with wit and humor.

There was neither haze nor fog in the atmosphere of his intellectuality. His statements were as clear as crystal and his gestures as unique and vigorous as his Anglo-Saxon. A strong anecdotal strain enlivened his logic. His metaphors were as sparkling and refreshing as the morning dew, and his perorations as prismatic as his Cumberland rainbows. Indeed, his speeches recalled scenes in his native mountains. While listening to his diction you saw vivid flashes of lightning and heard reverberations of thunder in crag-bound gorges; the rain poured from the skies and the mountain streams were swollen to torrents. Anon there were gentle showers. Then the light of the sun streamed through rifts in the clouds. Twilight darkened the dells, and night came on apace. The light of the moon softened the upland scenery. Strains of sweet music arose from secluded cabins, and there was the patter of joyous feet upon the floor. Later on, the merry jest, the mountain song, the clinking cup, and a wild hurrah were heard, with possibly angry words and the sharp crack of a rifle. But with the dawn the birds again twittered in the chinquapins, the rivers in the valleys again mirrored the mountains above them, and the work of another day had begun.

The comparison is not overdrawn. No speeches more telling, more sparkling, and more picturesque than those of the patriot from East Tennessee were ever delivered upon the floor of this House.

Mr. Houk was as natural a product of her mountains as the ash, oak, and hickory that shade their slopes. He had the solidity of the oak, the elasticity of the hickory, and the toughness of the ash. His nature was as firm in fiber and equally as rare in quality. His mind was as rich in resources as the ridges themselves. Like the mountains, he was ligneous as well as ferruginous. There was iron, coal, and marble in his composition—strength, warmth, and beauty. But above all was his almost peerless patriotism, loyalty, and love of liberty.

Leonidas! the very name is redolent with memories of Thermopylæ. This Leonidas of East Tennessee is worthy of comparison with his Spartan namesake. He was Spartan in nature as well as Spartan in name and fame. Each exhibited the same spirit. Each stood at his own mountain pass, and held back the invader. There was no dross in the loyalty that inspired the little band at Thermopylæ. There was no dross in the loyalty that filled the Union regiments in East Tennessee. It was not death in battle that alone confronted these patriots. It was the ignominious death that awaited them if captured in the fluctuations of the war; for many of them were Confederate conscripts. Listen to the words of Leonidas C. Houk, delivered upon this floor in the Fiftieth Congress:

> It was an easy thing to be loyal in Ohio [turning toward Gen. Grosvenor]. It was easy to be loyal in Michigan [turning to Col. BURROWS]. It was a mighty easy thing to be loyal in Vermont [turning to Judge STEWART]. But when it comes to where we live in East Tennessee, where we were in the grip of a great military organization, where all the influences of social life and all the machinery of a State were brought to bear upon us to crush out all human hopes, it was not so easy. Yet the loyal sentiment burned even more brightly in my part of the country throughout the entire war. Sir, I have the honor to represent a district in Congress, although it belongs to the Solid South, that gave more soldiers to the Union Army, according to population, than any other district in the United States. I speak from the record. I dare you to go to the War Department and investigate it. The First and Second districts of Tennessee gave more soldiers to the Union Army than any other two districts in the United States.

Mr. Houk was warm in his friendships. His personal qualities were most endearing. There was no malevolence in his disposition. His heart throbbed with generosity. He treasured no wrongs. He loved his people as he loved his mountain home. Goldsmith well said:

> Dear was the cot to which his soul conforms,
> And dear that hill that lifts him to the storms.

The interests of his constituents were his interests. On their behalf he never hesitated to fly even in the face of his party. There are men in this House who saw his indignation flame when an attempt to throttle the consideration of the claims of loyal Southerners was made in a House controlled by his political friends. Side by side with men who had been Confederate soldiers he stood arrayed against the attitude of his party. He detested hypocrisy and never made his bed with Pharisees. He believed in hard fighting on the basis of eternal truth and in his right to secure what was won in the fight.

Mr. Speaker, the death of such a man is a public calamity. He may not have won the fame of a Grundy or of a Clay, but he is full as close to the hearts of the people. His virtues were far greater than his faults. His inspirations were national. He acted well his part in the drama of American life. He came from the land of the skies. He has gone to the land of the skies. The universal amnesty he so generously advocated on earth will there be freely extended to all who are entitled to it. His good deeds are the milestones that mark the pathway of his life. They are plainly visible.

> Others have made roads for us; we make them for still others;
> Christ made a road to the stars for us all.

[Applause.]

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Speaker, "Kind words can never die," and a noble, generous deed is imperishable. True sympathy for human misfortune, and a hand ready and willing to help in affliction, are among the pure and undefiled elements which make the world better, and contribute to render moral conduct unspotted. We shall never behold the perfect man, but there are virtues and graces in the lives and characters of all true men which shine forth like the stars.

Certain kind words and a certain generous act of Mr. Houk, uttered and done long before I became acquainted with him, and of which I had information through a friend who was the beneficiary thereof, first fastened my attention upon him and commended him to my respect and admiration. There resides in the town where I live, an ex-Tennesseean, a worthy man, from the page of whose memory and gratitude the name of Leonidas Campbell Houk will never be obliterated. What I am about to relate occurred during that unhappy period in our history when the storms of war swept over the land, when the tide of passion and prejudice was at its highest mark, when people of the same State were arrayed in deadly hostility against each other, when even brothers followed different banners "in the focal and foremost fire."

Convictions of patriotic duty impelled these Tennesseans to espouse different causes—the one to enlist in the Union, and the other in the Confederate army. It happened in the fates of war, that the latter was captured, and while en route to a Federal prison was seen by Col. Houk. The prisoner was poor and helpless and hopeless. Col. Houk talked to him kindly, sympathetically, and tenderly—commiserated his misfortune with that chivalric spirit which prompts the true soldier to "raise the foe, when in battle laid low"—inquired as to his necessities, and proffered him substantial aid in the shape of money, to alleviate the privations of prison life.

This was at first declined for the reason that it might never be possible to repay it—that they might never meet again; but this noble and generous man would take no denial of his charity and would listen to no declination of his kindness. He took from his pocket a liberal amount of current money of the United States, and over all remonstrance insisted upon its acceptance. How useful that money was, what a real benison it brought to the long and weary days of subsequent incarceration, only that prisoner and those who have undergone a similar experience can describe. I have frequently borne grateful messages to Mr. Houk from this recipient of his generosity, assured him of the continued appreciation of his kindness, and how lasting were the personal esteem and affectionate remembrance in which he was held. These messages he would receive with satisfaction, but exceeding modesty, reflecting in his words and manner the grand and glorious rule of conduct, "It is more blessed to give than to receive."

My subsequent acquaintance with Mr. Houk and my observation of his course convinced me that this was but an illustration of the gentleness and kindliness of his nature. I have often listened to his earnest and eloquent appeals upon this floor in behalf of his unfortunate countrymen in the South who had lost their property by the ravages of war. Strong as was his devotion to the Union cause, he was ever ready to speak kindly and deal gently with those who differed from him, and he seemed never to forget that they were of and among his people.

Mr. Houk was a conspicuous figure in the House, as he was one of the most prominent Republicans in the whole South. He always received attention when he participated in discussion. There was a directness and positiveness about his methods and mannerism which challenged respectful notice even from those who disagreed with him. His history and record testify that he was a remarkable and extraordinary man. Contending, as he had to do, in his youth with adversity, prosecuting his studies, rudimentary and professional, under great difficulties, he was wonderfully successful, and demonstrated in his career, to an unusual degree, the possibilities of typical American manhood. His achievements are object lessons to the ambitious youth of our country, and teach them what energy and industry and unyielding purpose, fostered by the genius of our institutions, may accomplish.

I must leave it to others better qualified to portray the general excellencies of his character and to suitably describe the elements that combined to make him a man of note and merit. My purpose is to perpetuate the fact that he observed and obeyed the "new commandment, that ye love one another;" to record a magnanimous trait, charming and beautiful, which distinguished his life and conduct; to show that he had a warm and compassionate heart, easily touched at the sight of the calamity of his brother man, and quick to respond in relief. Such a virtue is worthy of all commemoration.

What nobler, sublimer attribute can attach to humanity than that which leads its possessor "to feel another's woe" and minister to its necessity? What higher type of duty discharged can adorn the life of any man than the exemplification of practical benevolence?

> "What writest thou?" The vision raised its head,
> And, with a look made of all sweet accord,
> Answered, "The names of those who love the Lord."
> "And is mine one?" said Abou. "Nay, not so,"
> Replied the angel.
> Abou spoke more low,
> But cheerily still, and said, "I pray thee, then,
> Write me as one who loves his fellow-men."
> The angel wrote, and vanished. The next night
> It came again with a great wakening light,
> And showed the names whom love of God had blessed,
> And, lo! Ben Adhem's name led all the rest.

[Applause.]

Mr. O'FERRALL. Mr. Speaker, for eight years I served in this House with Leonidas C. Houk; for four years I was associated with him on the Committee on Elections.

Service on this floor with a fellow member, however long, may not enable you to form an intelligent opinion of his character or ability, but the intimate relations which necessarily spring up in the committee room of one of the leading committees of this House, where day after day running through an entire Congress you are brought in close association with him, gives you an opportunity to study him as an open book before you and place your estimate upon him.

And thus it was in the committee room where I served so long with this distinguished man, more than in this Hall, that I studied him and learned to know him, and I think to know him well.

In the early part of that service I was impressed with his quick perception, and the high order of his ability. His mind was always active, never sluggish. He reached his conclusions with rapidity and then maintained them with great power.

In debate he was aggressive, but always fair; strong, yet just to his adversary; he hit hard blows, but always in a manly way; he was adroit, but took only such advantages as were legitimate and proper.

He was a Republican of the most earnest kind—his nature was earnest, his manner was earnest, he was the personification of earnestness—and while at times I thought, as one differing with him politically, that his zeal for his party principles led him into extreme positions, I never for a moment questioned his sincerity and honesty.

He was at all times open, frank, and candid. He was a stranger to duplicity and scorned in his very soul the ways of deceit and dissimulation. He feared not power and cringed not at its feet, and despised the sycophant. He was brave, courageous, and chivalrous.

He loved his people and guarded with jealous care their interests. The rights of the lowliest constituent were as sacred in his eyes as those of the loftiest. He would battle as valiantly for the humble cottager as for the princely lord of broad acres.

He was not only watchful of the interests of his own district, but time and again have I seen him rushing to the support of his colleagues when they were engaged in contests over matters affecting their districts, and, as other gentlemen have already said, in all claims for relief which came up from the Southern section of this land—a land blighted by the hot sirocco of war, desolated by the ravages of civil strife—the energies of Leonidas C. Houk were exerted and his strong voice was raised in their behalf.

Sir, though we traveled political paths as wide apart as the poles, I regarded this distinguished Tennessean as a model Representative and worthy of all the honors which his people showered upon him.

Passing now from him as a Representative, I wish to speak briefly of him as a man. I say briefly, for my time is short.

In disposition he was all sunshine; his face was radiant with good nature, and he ever met you with a cheerful greeting and kind word. His heart was all warmth, and his breast was filled with the milk of human kindness. He delighted in helping others, and no friend ever sought a favor at his hands without receiving it if in his power, and if impelled to decline, his manner was so gracious as to make even his refusal delightful.

It is no wonder, Mr. Speaker, that those of us who knew him as a member of this House miss him; we miss his familiar figure and genial face; we miss him in debate; we miss him as a Representative and a friend.

It is no wonder that the bar, of which he was long a member, should declare in resolutions that "he was, and of necessity must have been, a remarkable man," and that "he was esteemed and honored by his political brethren as a brilliant member of his party, and his intellect and ability were always respected by his opponents."

He had represented his district for six consecutive terms and had been elected for his seventh term to this Congress when suddenly he was cut down, and we now lay aside our public duties, calm the tempest of debate, forget the acrimony of political strife, obliterate party lines, and, with our minds filled with the most pleasant recollections of him, we gather here in this Hall, where his voice, now stilled, was so often heard, to pay our tributes to his memory.

When I parted with him at the close of the second session of the Fifty-first Congress little did I think, as he grasped my hand and bade me good-bye, that I was parting with him forever. He seemed to be in excellent health and his spirits were buoyant, while his eye beamed with friendship and in his face were reflected the rays of the sunshine that ever lit up his big heart.

Sir, God's ways we know not. His ways are not man's ways. If we could have averted the blow, or turned aside the death shaft, or dashed the poisoned cup from him before, unconscious of its deadly contents, he pressed it to his lips, oh, how gladly we would have done so. But God willed it otherwise, and there was no human hand to rescue him and no human voice to warn him. He quaffed unconsciously the poisoned potion and with it death, and in a few fleeting hours his spirit winged its flight to the throne above—love could not stay it, tears could not arrest it, prayers could not hold it—God took it.

Mr. Speaker, another has said:

There is a voice from the tomb sweeter than song; there is a remembrance of the dead to which we turn even from the charms of the living: these we would not exchange for the pleasures or the bursts of revelry.

And so while we mourn the loss of our brother, there comes back to us from his grave, lately strewn with love's flowers, bedecked with love's garlands, and watered with love's tears, a sweet remembrance of his brilliant intellect, his sturdy character, his genial nature, his generous bearing, and his manly life. We will cherish his virtues and chisel deep his memory upon the tablets of our hearts.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, the life and career of our late colleague are only possible in a free country; and yet they are so frequent in our country that they excite no special remark. It is not that an humble man, from poor beginnings, makes distinction that marks it as unique, for that is common in all countries. There are no barriers so high and so strong that can not be surmounted or broken through by him who is endowed with natural power and ambitious aspirations; but that a man should be mechanic, soldier, lawyer, judge, and statesman in a comparatively short life, is only possible in a community where manhood is the sole requisite for recognition, and in a country that has not been divided into special pursuits—separated into fixed classes.

We reproduce in our country and in our generation the peculiarity of Grecian and Roman liberty, that the Senate is full of soldiers and the soldiery crowded with Senators; that he who is able to lead men, not merely in battle but in the discipline of the army, to care for them in camp, to provide for their wants, minister to their necessities, inspire their courage, keep alive their enthusiasm, can carry into civil life the qualities which give success, can organize party following, can make means sufficient to accomplish ends, can succeed in the contests upon the floors of deliberative bodies, as well as in the charge where belching cannon resists victory. In other words, in a country where every man is free, opportunity is given to merit in every walk of life, and that is all that merit has the right to ask or needs to have conferred upon it.

The life of our late colleague was not the life that can be led by a weak man. Success does not come in a strong country, among stalwart people, to the weak. He may have had faults; they were not faults of weakness. In a country like East Tennessee, that beautiful and exquisite country, with those landscapes which fill their valleys with sunshine and beauty, with those mountains that demonstrate the power and the glory of the Creator, no man rises to leadership save he who is blessed with strength of brain and brawn. They may follow him who has faults; they will not follow a coward, a weakling, or a palterer.

That a poor orphan boy, left to the heritage of obscurity and poverty, making a stride upward in becoming a cabinet-maker, should dominate those people for fourteen years, receiving with increased majorities the renewed commission of their approbation and confidence, demonstrates more than any words of his colleagues that he was a man of vigor, of resource, of courage, of sincerity, of power.

It is somewhat curious how often the Lord gives the great work of the world into the hands of the orphan. If we take the lives of the workers of mankind, we must be struck with the fact how often it is to the hands of the fatherless that the heaviest and most skillful work has been committed.

Whether it is that in some mysterious but real way He takes the place of the father, or whether it is that the woman is more mighty than we presume, and that she in her loneliness is given an added power by having taken away from her the limitations of wifehood and put upon her in increased burden the duty of motherhood, I do not undertake to determine; but it is true that there is something in orphanage of itself that is developing, inspiring, and stimulating, something that gives to early boyhood the resolution of manhood and to early manhood the intrepidity of heroism.

It is in itself a great educator, and we who have had the benefit of college and of school, who have been blessed with libraries from our earliest youth, whose sweetest memories go back to the crowded shelves of a great library which a venerable and learned man illumined with his love and his learning, sometimes belittle that higher education which, in the buffetings of adverse fortune, by the struggles of adversity, though the counteracting influences and agencies that poverty creates, fits the man for the highest work in life.

What is it to be educated, save to be fit to do that which under the providence of God we are called to do? It may be that we are fashioned and tempered in the best forms of factories. It may be that we are hammered into qualifications amid the storms of adversity upon the anvil of poverty. I sometimes hear of self-made men. There are no other sort of men that do anything in life. Opportunities may be given for quicker and better workmanship; but in the end and in the substance each man makes himself, and upon each man is put the responsibility of his life and his work.

In looking, too, at the life of this our colleague there is to me another affecting fact. I believe in the dignity of human labor. I believe in the glory of the coronal of honest sweat; and if there be any mechanical labor that is more than any other touching to me, it is that of him who works in wood. There is one honest shop that is in history the perfection of integrity—the carpenter shop at Galilee. He who works in wood must, if he be inspired of higher and spiritual truths, take on something of that life which gave itself for others.

In the day of division he adhered to the Union.

It was easy to be loyal elsewhere, as he said. I know something of how hard it was to be loyal in East Tennessee. In that land, where the very hearthstone was broken by the terrible plowshare of civil strife and the backlog splintered by the cannon ball of civil combat, it was often hard for a man to follow his convictions.

And in the troublous times that followed the war, in the times that were sadder and harsher because there was only silent submission, which is infinitely more painful than armed resistance, in those sad days it was a hard place to live. During all those years, in war and peace, he followed his convictions, giving up no principle, always earnest in utterance, holding the confidence of the people among whom he lived and having before him the hope of a closer Union. That closer Union we will turn over to our children: and the principles on which it is based we give to the world. Not merely Union, but liberty and equality.

Standing to-day in this august Hall of the Representatives of sixty-five millions of people, what is the best plea for our existence? Not that we should be free, not that our civilization should be preserved to us only, but that in a sense that is real we are making for the world a better freedom, a higher civilization, a nobler life, and that we will render possible to all nations that which rendered his career possible, binding the world together in the bonds of brotherly freedom upon the simple but sublime principle of the equality of manhood. [Applause.]

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. Speaker, it is not a vain service that we render here to-day. It is true that the words we speak here and the tributes of affection we bring here may speedily pass away. The tragedy of human life is made all the more pathetic by the certain dealing of time with all we do and all we say. Of the hundreds who in a century have been enrolled in this House nearly all are forgotten, and, living or dead, have literally passed from the memory of the world. There are a score of portraits and statues in this Capitol which already need the research of the curious student to recall the statesmen and popular leaders whom an earlier generation thought worthy of an historic place in marble and on the canvas. They are almost as helpless as the figures of the great of other ages that are dug up in the débris of ruined cities. They illustrate the impressive lesson that all the transient dignities of earth must put off the robes of worldly distinction in the presence of the grave. Yet we ought not to withhold from the record of our proceedings the words of eulogy with which we are accustomed to show our sense of loss in the death of our associates.

I leave to others to collect from the history of his times the memorials of Judge Houk's activity and influence in public affairs. It was given to him to bear an honorable part in those memorable years when the nation was brought to trial for its life. The region in which he lived was torn by civil strife in a sense unknown on either side of the border States. In the mountains of Tennessee, Kentucky, Maryland, and Virginia, where loyalty was not diseased by the infection of slavery, the war came to the very doors of the people, dividing churches, estranging families, and adding to the horror of blood the nameless bitterness of civil passion. It was an ordeal that tested the manhood of the mountains, and I never look up the summits of my native Alleghanies without a sense of gratitude to God that in the hour of the national trial they stood like a wall of solid rock for the national unity and the emancipation of the slave.

The State of Tennessee, like Virginia, was torn from the Union by questionable methods and was attached to the Confederacy. But the mountaineers of East Tennessee, like the mountaineers of West Virginia, refused to participate in the lawless proceedings. They loved liberty, hated slavery, and by an instinct shared by the humble and lowly of the whole world they clung to the Union and followed the national armies with a faith that never faltered. The times produced an array of fearless men, who comprehended with clear sagacity the direction of events. Often in the progress of the nations the things that are hidden from the wise and prudent are revealed to faithful and devoted hearts. So that it is no miracle that the cabins of Tennessee and Virginia had a more perfect understanding of the question at stake than the colonial palaces of the South, where the eyes of men were holden, that they could see neither the future of the slave nor the manifest destiny of their country.

Judge Houk, already risen from the servitude of hard surroundings to a position of influence at the bar and before the people, early enlisted in the Union Army and was shortly afterwards commissioned as colonel of a regiment which he recruited among the neighbors who lived about him. His record as a soldier was full of gallant service. His public career on the national field lay in a time and place that called for definite ideas and fixed convictions. He was lacking in neither. He was always ready to give a reason for his faith. He was a partisan and a believer in free and open speech. He gave the people the best thoughts that were in him in a style which, if it lacked the artifice of the schools, was never wanting in the nervous force of natural eloquence. His people trusted him with a confidence that neither doubted his abilities nor suspected his motives, as his majorities, increasing steadily year by year, sufficiently attest.

He was an ideal popular orator, speaking to his people in the common metaphors of their daily speech and bringing to the level of the humblest firesides the largest questions of national politics. Not infrequently he entertained the House by his quaint figures, drawn from the life of his own people, as in the last Congress, when he pronounced the argument of his colleague in an election case as "hog tight and horse high." It had the unmistakable flavor of the stump, but it easily caught the attention of the House. He was not a despiser of the stump—that peculiar institution which takes us back to primitive backwoods days. He shared with Horace Greeley the opinion of the stump expressed in a recent publication in the Century Magazine of an old lecture on Abraham Lincoln:

> In the absence of the stump I doubt the feasibility of maintaining institutions more than nominally republican. But the stump brings the people face to face with their rulers and aspirants to rule, compels an exhibition and scrutiny of accounts and projects, and makes almost every citizen, however heedless and selfish, an arbiter in our political controversies, enlisting his interest and arousing his patriotism. The allowance of a monarch, exorbitant as it is, falls far below the cost of choosing a President. But the acquaintance with public affairs diffused through a canvass is worth far more than it costs.

Judge Houk brought into this House the skill of a trained debater. His tongue was sharp as a sword, and while he never poisoned his words, he was for years a recognized master of all the arts of parliamentary warfare. His personal relations on both sides of the House were inspired by a kindly sentiment which, as is happily so often the case here, forgot the differences of politics and the acrimony of partisan contentions. Possibly this is only characteristic of American politics, for Max O'Rell, that amiable critic of nations, has been pleased to find our public life free from the touch of the universal malice which turns the politics of his own country into a standing quarrel.

I have many reasons to remember the cordial good will with which Judge Houk took my hand when I came here a stranger and entered upon the perplexing business in which we are engaged. He was a friend, ready in sympathy and disinterested in counsel. The news of his death brought to my heart a personal affliction and I have taken a part in the exercises of this hour because I wish to leave in the record of this memorial ceremony a public tribute to one whose memory I cherish with a sincere admiration.

Death has already begun to do for this Congress the fatal work that in the last filled so many days with the signs of mourning. As these solemn announcements are made from time to time, I often think of a venerable figure now gone from the noise of life, who, when the death of an eminent statesman was announced here, sadly recalled with profound feeling the words of the old monk, in Southey's narrative, as he showed to a serious traveler in the Escurial Titian's famous picture of the Last Supper. "I have sat," said he, "daily in sight of that picture for now nearly three score years. During that time my companions have dropped off, one after another, all who were my seniors, all who were my contemporaries, and many or most of those who were younger than myself. More than one generation has passed away, and there the figures in the picture have remained unchanged. I look at these until I sometimes think that they are the realities and we are the shadows." [Applause.]

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, it is a laudable custom that calls us together this afternoon to pay a passing tribute to the memory, the service, the friendship of our departed associate.

Leonidas Campbell Houk led an eventful life; eventful to himself, to his State, and to the nation. Born in a humble home and spending his early years among the honest yeomanry of Tennessee, earning his livelihood by the sweat of his brow, he became from childhood imbued with those sympathies for the humbler walks of life, and that respect and consideration for that large majority of our citizens, the toiling masses, which was ever present to his mind in his legislative work. He was a true representative of the people. There was no false pride about him, and I have heard him on this floor allude touchingly to the struggles of his early life and his humble surroundings.

He was too loyal to himself to seek to appear in any but his true character. He indulged in no shams. He was ever true and loyal to that large majority who can neither live in palaces nor dress sumptuously, but who are the creators of wealth, and who form that substantial basis upon which our whole social and political fabric rests. He was in touch with the masses from the day of his birth.

Learning early to respect labor, he instinctively abhorred and detested slavery, and when it came to the arbitrament of arms to keep that institution alive, there was but one choice for a man of his natural convictions to pursue.

Surrounded on all sides with disloyalty, Freedom mustered a gallant band of East Tennesseeans, devoted to liberty and humanity, and in that band of noble and immortal patriots young Houk became a leader of thought and of action.

It can not be estimated how valuable was this assistance, from within the very ranks of the Confederacy, to the Northern cause. To them Tennessee owes the credit of retaining, at least as far as their section of the State went, loyalty to the Union.

We are still too near the time of the conflict and the political struggles which followed to look with impartial eyes upon the leaders in that important drama. But when the great struggle for liberty and for the preservation of the Union shall assume that position in our history, as does Scotch-English border warfare in the history of Great Britain, some Walter Scott will immortalize that band of noble patriots, who, breaking through the prejudices of their surroundings, saved the honor of East Tennessee.

Mr. Houk was a natural leader among men. He was instinctively a "Democrat," using that word in its primary and noble sense. He led men, not by imperiousness, but because he was in full and complete sympathy with them. They knew they could trust him at all times, for their cause was his, and his very heart and being were devoted to the elevation and improvement of their conditions, as far as legislation can effect that purpose. He was not chimerical, but practical. He possessed a sound judgment and indomitable courage in execution. He was of a genial and generous disposition and forgetful of himself to serve a friend. And to him there was no dearth of warm and enthusiastic friends.

Serving with him on the Committee on Elections of the last Congress, I learned to love and admire him for his devotion to what he believed to be right, and the generosity with which he met those whose opinions differed from his own.

Mr. Houk was a partisan. In public life he could not be otherwise. But his party contentions on this floor, although at times earnest and even heated, never approached personal animosity, and never followed him beyond the doors of this Chamber. He attacked the principles of his adversary, not his person.

He was an earnest and at the same time entertaining speaker, zealous for his cause and of his rights. No man had a higher sense of national honor than he, and he was an impassioned advocate of the rights of those who held legal claims against the Government, and severely rebuked that economy which could be attained only by doing injustice to individuals. To him a refusal on the part of Congress to make necessary provision for the payment of honest and unquestioned claims was a disgrace to the country.

Simple in manner and approachable at all times, he kept in close touch with his friends and neighbors, and his death was lamented by thousands of his constituents, who wept, we are told, at his open grave as they would at the grave of a brother.

Mr. Houk had for years before his death been in feeble health. But he was a cheerful sufferer, uncomplaining, devoted to his duties, and with that hopefulness of the future which accompanies a just and upright life.

To such men as our departed friend the dissolution of the mortal body is merely the release of that soul, which—

> * * * Secured in her existence, smiles
> At the drawn dagger, and defies its point.
> The stars shall fade away, the sun himself
> Grow dim with age, and Nature sink in years;
> But thou shalt flourish in immortal youth,
> Unhurt amidst the war of elements,
> The wrecks of matter and the crush of worlds.

[Applause.]

Mr. COVERT. Mr. Speaker, in the great sisterhood of States constituting the Republic, the Commonwealth of Tennessee stands out prominently in exceptional directions. Nature has been most lavish in the dispensation of her gifts to this favored region.

Her natural resources have given her an exceptional present prosperity and the added promise of a still more successful future.

But rich as Tennessee is in her mineral and agricultural resources, she is richer still in the character of her people.

Her citizenship is composed of a strong and sturdy race of men, whose progressive spirit has successfully supplemented the work which nature so generously commenced.

The character of a people may very readily be determined by the manner of men who are sent to act for them at the national capital.

The State of Tennessee has been represented here ever since I have had any knowledge of the conditions by a delegation of thoroughly equipped men, alert in action, earnest in endeavor, and patriotic in purpose. Of such mold and of such character was he who for so many years represented the Knoxville district, and through whom the needs and wishes of his people were so eloquently and so effectively voiced in this Chamber.

It is not my purpose to speak in detail of the life and public services of him who, living we greeted as a friend, and whose memory we are met to-day to honor. This task has been most graciously and lovingly performed by his colleagues on both sides of this House.

We find from what they have told us that the lives of some men have about them the elements of romance; and the career of him who up to the close of the last Congress was a familiar figure in this Hall, is an illustration of the truth of this statement.

His cramped and straitened boyhood among the mountains of East Tennessee; his studious young manhood; his single-handed battle against "those twin jailers of the human heart, obscure birth and iron fortune;" his success at the bar; his career in the Legislature of his State; his elevation to a judgeship; his prompt and patriotic service in the field, when, torn and disrupted by the civil war, East Tennessee stood loyal to the Union, and finally, his long and distinguished career in this House—all have been detailed to us to-day by those who knew him best, and so knowing, loved and honored him most.

The life record of Leonidas C. Houk has about it not only the element of romance, but, more than this, it has about it all the distinctive elements of the best and truest heroism.

I shall detain this House to-day while I speak only of one element in a character which embodied very much of what was admirable—that of deep and earnest sincerity—a quality somewhat lacking in some, at least of those who hold official position to-day. Judge Houk was, above all else, if I judged him correctly, an eminently sincere man.

He felt deeply and gave honest expression to his feelings. He was a Republican from sincere conviction, and he never hesitated to make an honest fight against his political opponents.

If he had enemies to punish, the chastisement was inflicted in the open field, and without any empty prior negative declaration. In reaching any one of the various positions of honor he was called upon to fill, no prior mortgages upon his official action were ever given as means of attaining success, and no places or positions were used by him as personal possessions to be bestowed simply as rewards for personal support. If he ever made a voluntary pledge to be absolutely fair and just in the discharge of any official duty (and I doubt if he ever regarded it as at all necessary to make such a declaration), that pledge was not an empty form, but was an obligation to be most sacredly observed.

He fought for the substantial advancement of his party upon what he believed to be the higher and better lines of action, and he was not of those who think a faction triumph, resulting in personal success, better and more important than a party victory resulting in a supposed general good.

The death of any man would fail in one of its greatest purposes if it failed to lead the living into processes of examination and comparison.

Here, then, comes one of the chiefest lessons taught by the death of this sincere and outspoken Tennesseean.

Here, then, is the test. Let the public man of to-day, however exalted his official position, ask himself if he has the manly honesty, the simple sincerity, which characterized him of whom I speak.

Let him look into the clear mirror of our dead friend's character, and see if that mirror reflects back his own likeness.

> His words were bonds, his oaths were oracles,
> His love sincere, his thoughts immaculate,
> His heart as far from fraud as heaven from earth.

And now the curtain has fallen upon this stirring life drama, which, commencing in the mountains of Tennessee, had its action alike in the crowded court room, amid scenes of blood and carnage upon the battlefield, and closed with the exacting duties of legislation at the Federal capital. That all of Judge Houk's official obligations were well and worthily performed is abundantly proven by his long retention in the public service. That these services were gratefully appreciated and that he who rendered them was loved and respected is more than demonstrated by the universal sorrow felt at the announcement of his sudden death.

The State of Tennessee has lost one of her bravest, manliest sons, and the Congress of the United States one of its most zealous and faithful members.

There is a grief too sacred almost to be publicly alluded to, and I shall not speak of the nearer and deeper personal loss sustained by the widow and the fatherless, whose only heritage is the record of honor bequeathed to them by the devoted husband and fond father, who is to-day so deeply mourned.

Under the sod of the State he loved so well and to whose service he ungrudgingly gave the best years of his manhood, lies all that is mortal of our late associate.

An active, earnest life is ended. The shock of the battlefield and the sharp conflicts of professional and political strife are over; and the jurist, the soldier, and the statesman at last finds rest and peace in an honored grave.

> Here lurks no treason, here no envy swells,
> Here grow no damned grudges, here no storms,
> No noise—but silence and eternal sleep.

[Applause.]

Mr. BROSIUS. Mr. Speaker, I comply all the more cheerfully with the request with which the friends of the deceased have honored me to make some observations on this occasion, to which many others might perhaps with greater propriety address themselves, because I felt a sincere respect for our friend when living, and, dead, I venerate his memory.

When I first saw him on this floor with his powers in a state of exertion—in action on his chosen field—and noted the vigor of his mind, the celerity of his thought, and the clear-cut, incisive character of his debate, in connection with the peculiar and grotesque elements in his style, which embroidered the web of his argument, I thought he was a singularly interesting and picturesque character. When I learned something of his career—how firm his convictions, and how loyal he was to them; his love of justice and equality and his splendid fidelity to these principles—I found so much in him to admire that he never ceased to engage my interest and command my respect.

Born in a cabin, cradled in poverty, schooled in adversity, apprenticed to toil, spurred by the incentive of difficulties, succeeding by tireless endeavor, winning esteem and confidence by stainless probity, until by bearing the cross of hard circumstances he won the victor's crown of just applause for having deserved well of his country.

Beginning a career by gazing at the stars of night through rifts in the roof that sheltered his pillow, and ending it with stars of nobleness glittering on his brow, has been largely the story of American greatness, and such is the history of the friend whom we mourn to-day.

How instructive the lesson of such a life. To contemplate it and emulate it is the only way to make it profitable to us. Death comes like a faithful schoolmaster with the open book of a closed life, and assigns the lesson which we must study or lose its teaching. In contributing one little flower of affectionate remembrance to the chaplet with which the appreciation and esteem of those who knew him longer and better than I have garlanded his memory, I can not do better than to emphasize the pregnant lesson of his life. In doing so, I will seek nothing in his character or career, if anything there be, that does not command my respect and deserve my praise. In the presence of death all voices are silent save those of sincere sorrow and respectful eulogy. Criticism is mute. Censure has no tongue. This is the immunity of the grave.

No finer tribute can ever be paid to our system of free institutions, founded upon the equality of man, than such a career as this occasion presents for our contemplation. Among the glories of American political and social life which our history will illustrate and perpetuate there is not one that will shine down the ages with a more supernal splendor than that distinguishing character of our institutions which saves us from the fixed horizontal strata common in the Old World, through which few ever pass from below upward, and gives us instead a social formation as mobile as the sea, where the lowest drop, winged with merit, may rise until it glitters on the topmost crest.

This is attested in a most striking manner by the great number of aggressive and effective men by whom our public life has been adorned who were of humble origin and scanty scholarship, with no degrees to boast of and no diplomas to show.

From its first meeting, in 1774, to its last, in 1788, it is said 354 men sat in the Continental Congress, and two-thirds of them were self-made men. Of the seven or eight thousand men who have sat in Congress since 1789, many more than half rose from obscurity to eminence by their own unaided exertions.

Our departed friend is only the latest of a long and distinguished roll who have made our history luminous with a glow that only comes from characters which have had all base alloys melted out in the forge fires of adversity. No adventitious aids—neither birth, nor rank, nor fortune—helped him upward toward the clear-aired heights he reached and kept. His allies were parts and poverty. He climbed with beak and claw. The spurs he wore in the tournament of life were fashioned by his own effort and buckled to his heels with his own hands.

He early learned that the genius of success was the genius of toil. The only Aladdin's lamp he ever knew was a heroic soul, that no difficulty could ever daunt. His courage never sank before an adverse cast of fortune. His fortitude never failed to honor the heaviest draft made upon it. His industry was all-conquering, and his ambition invincible.

He stood so high in the hearts of the rugged mountaineers of East Tennessee, whom he so long represented, and whom he generously helped in ways which gratitude will preserve in perennial green, because of the splendid cluster of heroic qualities which were seen and admired by all his people.

In this elevated arena, which was the scene of his latest exertions and most enduring triumphs, his characteristic attributes, the virile qualities which made him a strong personality were observed and felt by all. When inspired by conviction and commanded by duty he turned neither to the right nor the left, but straight as an arrow in its flight went he to the task before him. He was a hard fighter, but an honest one. The man who broke a lance with him was sure

> To know the joy that warriors feel
> In foemen worthy of their steel.

The fiercer the onset and the deeper the combat the better the field was suited to his powers. The greater the issues involved, the stronger the passions aroused, the more tempestuous the debate, the more he delighted in the encounter. He was rigged for storms. And herein is the trial proof of man's mettle.

> The sea being smooth,
> How many shallow bauble boats dare sail
> Upon her patient breast, making their way
> With those of nobler bulk?
> But let the ruffian Boreas once enrage
> The gentle Thetis, and, anon, behold
> The strong-ribbed bark through liquid mountains cut.
> * * * * *
> Where then's the saucy boat
> Whose weak untimbered sides but even now
> Co-rival'd greatness? Either to harbor fled,
> Or made a toast for Neptune.

He was a strong-ribbed bark, and the sea was wild and raging indeed if he did not outride the storm.

But he had none of the pride that is ashamed to yield when convicted of error; none of the obstinacy that delights in contention for its own sake.

If he was fierce toward his antagonist, it was only while the battle was on. If he was quick with the retort, it was only when much enforced that he emitted the spark and was straightway cold again. If the keen lash of his sarcasm sometimes drew blood, it was only from those whom he believed were cringing sycophants of injustice and wrong. If he sometimes showed the heat of passion, he never betrayed the poison of malice. The antagonist whom he fought he could afterward love like a brother. He never nursed contention, nor sought fresh cause of enmity.

As the old Saxons covered their hearth fires at the sound of the evening curfew, so was he always ready at the end of each day to cover the embers of its struggle and strife. I have heard it said he had charity enough to love the man that hated him and to forgive an enemy. It is one of the high tests of a great soul that it foregoes revenge and dares to forgive an injury. He would touch palms and hearts with men of all views as long as they were sincere, and he was apt to cultivate the flowers that bloom over the walls of party politics. I have mistaken the man if he did not feel, in the calms that followed the storms of controversy, toward all men, friends and foes, that beautiful sentiment which holds the human family in the bonds of unity and love—

> That we are children of the same father, traveling toward the same home, and hoping to sit down at last at the same banquet, and therefore we should love one another.

It is thus seen what an instructive career has closed on earth. He did not live man's appointed time. The mysterious clock, which the Angel of Life wound up to run three score years and ten before handing the key to the Angel of the Resurrection, ran down before the lapse of the allotted time. But the bounds that are fixed to the duration of life do not always measure its worth. This career, though cut off in the midst of its usefulness, has not failed to teach that the path of duty is the upward way, that—

> Not once or twice in our fair land's story,
> The path of duty was the way to glory.

Is there yet a word that I can add that will carry on its wings solace to the bruised hearts of those who knew our friend best and loved him most? There is a tradition that among the Seneca Indians a singularly beautiful belief prevailed, that when a loved one died if they caught a singing bird and, binding it with messages of love and affection, released it over the grave of the departed, it would not fold its wings or close its eyes until it reached the spirit land and delivered the messages to the loved and lost. So may the friends who mourn to-day bind with messages of love the birds that are singing in their hearts songs of homage and affection, and, releasing them at the grave of the departed, may enjoy the solace of believing that they will not fold their wings until they reach the spirit land and deliver the messages to the loved and lost. [Applause.]

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Speaker, in the death of Judge Houk the people of his district and the State of Tennessee lost an able and efficient Representative in the Congress of the United States, the whole country lost an eloquent and patriotic statesman, and the Republican party the leader of its forces and the most formidable champion of its principles in the Southern States.

Starting in life without any of the advantages that wealth is supposed to give, without influential friends, his early education a blank, his career furnishes another example of those who have achieved distinction and won success by their own courage, energy, and determination in this free Republic. His early manhood was spent amid the stirring scenes and incidents of the war of the rebellion. He espoused the cause of the Government with all the zeal and ardor of a patriot, and at 26 years of age was colonel of a Tennessee regiment in the Union Army.

In no section was there engendered more bitterness of feeling, nor more implacable hatred than in East Tennessee at that period. Neighbors, and not unfrequently families, were divided, and as the armies swept over that section, the bitter personal animosities found expression in murders, assassinations, and the wanton and willful destruction of private property. The outrages and wrongs perpetrated upon the Union people of East Tennessee will never be fully written.

Judge Houk emerged from that struggle a recognized leader and one of the foremost men of his section. He was elected seven times to a seat on this floor and by large majorities, which testify to the confidence and trust in which he was held by his own people.

His greatest usefulness to his country was in his service upon this floor. He was thoroughly American, and loved liberty and freedom as much as he loved the free air of his native mountains. His highest services were given for free speech, free ballots, and free men. He was admirably equipped for legislative duties. He had a pungent and humorous wit, a bitter sarcasm, a trenchant invective combined with the closest logic and great eloquence, all of which he called to his ready use in debate. He believed in the Republican party, and believed that its doctrines were essential to the peace, prosperity, and happiness of the citizens of the Republic. Protection to American industries and protection to the wages of American labor he believed to be inherited by the Republicans from the Whigs, and his admiration was unbounded for the gallant Whig leaders of his native State. John Bell, Meredith P. Gentry, Neill S. Brown, Gustavus A.

Henry, Emerson Etheridge, Bailie Peyton, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Thomas A. R. Nelson, Horace Maynard, and their associate Whig leaders were his ideals of broad and progressive statesmen, and his highest ambition was to be a worthy descendant and representative of the Silver Gray Whigs of Tennessee. He believed in the people of Tennessee, and no representative of that State was ever closer to the people than he. He was a manly man. No shadow ever crossed his personal on political integrity. His love for and confidence in the people of his State, together with his profound conviction and attachment to the Republican party, made him, ipso facto, a power in its councils. It would have been better for that party had they had more men of like character and influence in the Southern States.

The emancipation of the slave and the extension of suffrage to the colored man, as a result of the war, produced a political convulsion in the South that was incomprehensible to any other than a resident of that section. It aroused the most bitter and relentless antagonisms to the Republican party. It developed a feeling of caste that was the outgrowth of two hundred years of heredity in the relation of master and servant. Not considering for an instant that the colored man, by reason of fidelity to the Union cause and as a means for his future protection, was entitled to some consideration, his enfranchisement was regarded as a personal insult and humiliation to each individual who had sustained the rebellion.

To make the upholding of republican principles more difficult, much was done in the matter of administration that would seem to justify the direful predictions that were proclaimed from the rostrum, the press, and the pulpit. Many who were not native and to the manner born were clothed with the power and dignity of officials as representatives of the Federal Government under Republican Administrations, and while, as a rule, they were good men and efficient officers, they utterly failed to comprehend the actual social, economic, and political conditions of the South. They became widely known as the Federal ring throughout the Southern States, and undoubtedly hindered, embarrassed, and delayed the extension of Republican principles and the growth and well-being of the Republican party.

Judge Houk, with his familiarity and personal knowledge of existing conditions, boldly and fearlessly protested against all Federal rings in his own party, and sought to make his party strong by reason of its advocacy of honest and economical government and its liberal, wise, and humane policy toward all classes, upon a basis of absolute and exact justice without regard to race or color. While protesting against Federal rings on the one hand he raised his voice with equal power and force against all intimidation, violence, rascality, and fraud in elections upon the colored people on the other. He denounced with bitter invective all devices of fraud and suppression of votes.

He, with great eloquence and earnestness, appealed to the people of his section to lay aside their prejudices against an innocent race and recognize their legal rights, to treat them kindly, advise them, impart knowledge and instruction of their political rights and duties; to banish dishonest elections, and bring up their young people to believe that honest government could only be secured by honest elections, to hold the ballot box sacred that the liberties of our people should be perpetuated and endure.

The eloquent voice of Judge Houk was heard for the Republican party upon this floor and wherever his duty called him at all times in the advocacy of honest government, local, State, and national, and the rule of honest majorities secured by a free ballot and a fair count. And his sudden and untimely death in the prime of life is a loss to that party that is nearly, if not quite, irreparable. [Applause.]

Mr. PEEL. Mr. Speaker, the cause of the sad gloom we see resting upon the faces of all present, and the apparent gloom upon the walls of this Chamber, is known to us all. There is one conspicuous and well-known member of this body gone, and gone forever; that one is Leonidas Campbell Houk, of Tennessee. He died at his home in Knoxville May 25, 1891. The life and character of this distinguished fellow citizen is as remarkable as honorable. He was born in Sevier County, Tenn., June 8, 1836. His father, a poor mechanic, died when he was but 3 years old. His mother in a few years married again, but did not increase her financial fortune. Therefore, his early education was much neglected, only going to common country schools three months.

Notwithstanding all these embarrassments and obstacles, we find him educated, not by the polished teacher in the school room, but by the more rugged road of self-reliance and determination. God had given him a well-balanced brain and a will that knew no defeat. His heart and soul were inspired by that love of character and country which marked his long and useful career. Though fatherless and penniless, he resolved to rise among men. His young mind fed upon all useful literature that his scanty means would afford.

Scarcely in his teens we find him toiling in the field and shop for support. When night came, though tired and weary, the oil lamp was soon lighted, and his new labors began. Night after night he grappled with the dry and complex maxims of the law, until his mind was tired as his body. Knowing no failure, he pushed on until 1859, when he was admitted to the bar of his native State. His practice grew with the man; the lawyer who met him in a case was soon reminded of the old adage, "Beware of the lawyer with but one book." He continued his chosen profession with courtesy and success until the muttering thunders of war were heard. The time soon came when the public heart was troubled, when all ears were listening for words of wisdom and all eyes were looking for leaders.

It was then that young Houk was chosen to the loyal convention of his State, where he distinguished himself for his wisdom and loyalty to the old flag. And when the fierce clash of arms came, he did not wait for high-sounding titles or sparkling uniforms, but shouldered his musket and joined the army for the Union as a private. But it was not long until those over him saw that God had made him for something more than to shoot, and he was promoted to lieutenant in the First Tennessee Infantry. His loyalty to the service and gallantry in the field soon placed him at the head of the Third Tennessee as colonel, in which place he served with like fidelity until compelled to resign on account of ill health.

Not willing to cease his usefulness to the cause of the Union, he connected himself with the press. His writings, like his character, were vigorous, courteous, and strong. In 1864 he again was placed in the field as elector upon the Lincoln and Johnson ticket: was next elected to the State convention that reorganized his State government. When the smoke of the last battle had cleared away and the last soldier had stacked his gun Col. Houk was elected judge of the seventeenth judicial district of Tennessee, where he served with ability and satisfaction for four years; then he moved to Knoxville and resumed the practice of law. His great public service in the council chamber, in the field, and upon the bench so endeared him to the people of East Tennessee, that he was again called from that profession that he so dearly loved and learned by the midnight lamp to serve his country as a member of the Southern Claims Commission.

From that we find him serving his people as State legislator, in national Republican conventions, elector, etc., until he was elected a member of this body, commencing in the Forty-sixth Congress, succeeding himself to the Forty-seventh, Forty-eighth, Forty-ninth, Fiftieth, Fifty-first, and Fifty-second Congresses. This long and varied public service shows how he was dearly loved by those who knew him best. He was their adviser, leader, and friend. He was the pride of his people, the idol of his party, and a faithful public servant. Judge Houk, as he was called, was a Republican in politics; he was not a Republican because he disliked Democrats, but because he believed in the principles of his party. He was a strong advocate at the bar, upon the hustings, or upon this floor; bold and aggressive in his views, yet tolerant, courteous, and kind. His heart was as warm as it was big. He loved his friends; nothing was too good for them that was his. He was a good husband, an affectionate father, an honest man.

Mr. Speaker, East Tennessee was loyal to the Union in our late civil war, while the balance of the State cast her fortunes with the South. The feeling between those who served in the contending armies was bitter and strong. When peace came the Union soldiery in that section largely predominated. The ex-Confederate felt that he had no friend except his comrades in defeat—ostracized, disfranchised, and outlawed. Indeed these were dark days for him. Judge Houk, like the brave and noble man he was, was the first in all Tennessee to proclaim from the house top in favor of equal rights for the ex-Confederate. He was the first man to take him by the hand and say, "We are American citizens, under the same flag, entitled to equal rights, legal and political, before the law."

This one act should endear his memory to all mankind. Tennessee, you have lost a true friend, an efficient, faithful servant. He is gone. With you we mourn, and accept his honored son. His death came when least expected; in usual health, at home with those he loved most tenderly, in the beautiful month of May, when all nature bloomed with full life, by the sad result of accidental poisoning, within a few brief hours he died. So sudden, so quick, that we are forcibly reminded of the lines written by some one:

Life, I know not who thou art;
But this I know, you and I must part.
How, when, and where first we met
I own to me is a secret yet.

It's hard to part with friends so dear;
'Twill cause a sigh, a tear.
Then steal away; give little warning;
Say not good night, but in some brighter clime, good morning.

[Applause.]

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, I came almost immediately from the burial of a beloved father to take a part in this service. My so recent experience impresses me with the sorrow and the sympathy of this occasion. The spoken word can only faintly express the pathos of feeling. But I gladly give brief speech as a tribute to the memory of a distinguished member of this House, with whom I was intimately associated in two former Congresses. The feeling I would cherish as kind and tender, almost as intimate, towards the son, the younger Mr. HOUK, who has become our associate in this Congress. We mourn the departure of the Hon. Leonidas C. Houk, the soldier, the jurist, the statesman, whose patriotism and valor, experience and ability, principle and fidelity gave him the respect and the reward of merit. We assuage sorrow in the presence and the fellowship of the son, whose worth surely has the example, the counsel, and the emulation of a noble sire. So this service appeals to me, as perhaps it may to others, as somewhat singular and duplex in its significance. I join in the expressions of peace and honor to the father, and at the same time in expressions of condolence and recognition to the son.

To me, as one of the youngest members of the Fiftieth Congress, the presence and prestige of the great Unionist from Tennessee were interesting. His acquaintance was sought, his friendship cultivated. He seemed to a young New Englander to represent the sturdy frontiersman of loyalty, and to possess that rugged character, which, joining ability and persistent effort, conquered obstacles and accomplished good, wise and large work for the benefit of his country. And with it all, the kind heart, the tender feeling, the noble emotions of mankind never became calloused or shriveled.

There is not an overabundance of unselfishness among Congressmen. It is sometimes doubted if there is always a surplus of genuineness in political action. Younger members can attest the consideration, the helpfulness, and the encouragement which come to them from their elders in service. Leonidas Houk was one who rightfully receives the acknowledgment of ready and cheerful aid to those associates who sought his counsel. If he had more or less—less as it seems to me—of the individual selfishness which governs in political places, he unmistakably had more than the ordinary degree of genuineness in public action. It was sometimes brusque and aggressive; it was fearless always. It left an impress of conscientious action on an honest belief. It sometimes took a course which might shock the trimming calculator in policy, but it gave to our friend the name of a stalwart in action on his political principle, as he saw the right and as he saw his duty. That one characteristic lives with me as a memory of Leonidas Houk—genuine courage of action in fidelity to his personal political belief in all matters, great or small. [Applause.]

Mr. MCMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, it is not my purpose at this late hour, after the exercises have been prolonged, to speak at great length on this occasion. Yet I do not feel inclined to let the opportunity pass of offering my humble tribute to one to whom in life I extended friendship, whose friendship in life I could boast, and whose death I sincerely mourn.

Thirteen years ago Judge Houk and I came to this Hall together. It saddens my heart, Mr. Speaker, when I think of the changes that have been wrought by the thirteen intervening years. At that time, at one end of this Capitol or the other, there were those great orators, since dead, Ben Hill, Roscoe Conkling, Matt Carpenter, Zack Chandler, Burnside, Beck, and a long line of others who might be mentioned, who have preceded our friend to the tomb. There were still others who have since left these halls, among whom might be mentioned Judge Thurman, McDonald, Kernan, and other illustrious statesmen. I say the scenes have changed since then, and we come now by these exercises to emphasize the fact that after all, and inevitably, our destiny will be that of our dead friend—the tomb.

Judge Houk came from the State called the "Volunteer State," because of the spirit of her sons, that sent them into the forefront of every conflict where the American citizen was called upon to convert himself into an American soldier. He came from that beautiful and picturesque portion of the State where the mountains rise to the clouds; a region that can boast that it was the inspiration of the sweetest of all nonscriptural songs ever written, for I have it indirectly from two persons, from John Howard Payne himself, that the inspiration of that incomparable song that has delighted so many hearts and dampened so many eyes, Home, Sweet Home, was seeing the Indians moving back and forth across the river before they were sent westward to their new reservation.

Judge Houk was a poor boy, as has been said by more than one speaker this evening. When I look at the long line of those who have become illustrious from an humble and poverty-stricken beginning, I begin to conclude that against which humanity struggles so very strenuously—Poverty—is a blessing rather than a curse to a young man. How many young men do you see who have the ability to satisfy every wish, to gratify every ambition, living without exertion, ever come to that prominence which characterized one who, like the eagle, is shaken off to dare the dangers and the glories of the skies.

Judge Houk came from Tennessee, noted for her heroism during the Revolutionary war; for it will be remembered by the student of history that when Ferguson sent across the mountains, then a portion of Western North Carolina, a statement that if they did not behave themselves he would send over the troops and chastise them, that great governor of Tennessee, and great soldier, Sevier, got with his friend Shelby. They sat down on a fallen log, and there, with that spirit which has been the strength of the American people in the past and is destined to be its bulwark in the future, determined that instead of waiting for Ferguson to send over his troops, they would go and capture Ferguson and his troops; and they did it at King's Mountain, thus making Revolutionary success possible. It is a region that has sent many poor young men to preëminence.

It is a State where poverty can not impede a young man in his march to preëminence and power, and where wealth has never yet succeeded in aiding any man to preferment.

What record is that of Judge Houk? Although it has been recounted, let me epitomize it. Born in 1836 and left an orphan, as stated by my distinguished friend [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky] at 3 years old; a lawyer, without the benefit of a prior education, except such as research gave without academics or colleges, at 23; a soldier at 25; colonel of his regiment at 26; member of the State constitutional convention at 29; judge of the circuit court at 31; member of the Legislature at 36; elected to Congress when 42, and serving six full terms and elected to his seventh before his death. This is a record of which his State, his family, and all poor young men in this country may be proud.

But, Mr. Speaker, there is one incident in the life of Judge Houk to which I desire to call attention, and upon which I would place special emphasis. We who were either lads or soldiers during the late war know how hard it was to shake off the prejudices that came with or lingered after it.

I remember the first time I saw Judge Houk. He was then, as he was before and after, a strong believer in the doctrines of the Republican party, and a strenuous advocate of its principles. But there was a conflict raging at that time in Tennessee. One of the questions involved, indeed the main question I may say, was whether those who had borne arms against the Government should have the right to vote restored to them, or should be forever excluded from the polls. If there were nothing else in his history, if there were nothing else to show the strength of the man and the magnanimity of his nature, the very fact that he stood up then against his party and spoke from one end of the State to the other and assisted greatly in carrying through the proposition to reënfranchise those who had been disfranchised and to make voters of those against whom he had fought, would be sufficient to make the grass grow greener over his tomb as long as I have a heart with which to be grateful. [Applause.]

You may say he was a partisan, and he was. You may say he was a fierce fighter in a political conflict, and he was. I like the partisan; I like the strenuous fighter; I like the man who, in the first place, has intelligence enough to have opinions, but I also like the man who has courage to avow them. It is no discredit of Judge Houk in my estimation that he had strong convictions and stood by them. He was not only a strenuous antagonist, but he was as bold as any lion that ever left lair. There never could be any doubt as to where he stood; but after the conflict was ended he was gentle, and then he had a feeling of brotherhood that rose above all politics and a patriotism that stood by him ever. Thus much I know of Judge Houk, and thus much I know better than any man in this House concerning his action in favor of enfranchisement, for I happened, when I was a law student in 1869, to be present at one of his speeches when he advocated the broad rights of man and put forth the doctrine that, where the strongest efforts had been made to enfranchise those who had recently been in slavery, the men who had done that could never justify themselves in the eyes of their countrymen or of posterity if they at the same time withheld from those who had formerly been free, whose fathers had fought the war of the Revolution and established the Constitution and carried our country to glory—that they could never justify themselves if they kept those men from the polls whilst others were permitted to go there.

But, Mr. Speaker, having said thus much, I will close by saying that those who knew Judge Houk best loved him best, and whoever knew him well will say amen when I declare that in all this House and in all the region that knew him, or knew of him, there goes forth a sympathetic palpitation of the heart to those loved ones who are left with a home darkened by his death. [Applause.]

Mr. CHEATHAM. Mr. Speaker, there have already been so many grand and truthful things said about the distinguished deceased that I shall find it difficult to steer clear of the same channels in order to avoid repetition. However, the removal of the name of Hon. Leonidas C. Houk from the membership of this body by the great hand of death was not only a sad and deplorable event with the great State of Tennessee, that had so wisely seen fit to honor him, but his brave, though conservative and eventful national career, together with the sad manner by which he came to his death, caused the whole country to feel keenly his untimely death. Judge Houk was in many respects a wonderful man; he did not only manage, with his limited means and opportunities, to elevate himself from the humble walks and conditions of life to a more honorable and exalted plane and there remained with contentment and ease, but he ventured further.

In his struggles along the rugged and thorny pursuits of time, seeking a share of the honors and laurels of this life, he soon reached the station of usefulness where he had a chance to convince men of the moral and intellectual powers which he possessed. He became an able advocate at the bar, in which sphere he gained for himself a lasting and imperishable reputation, and step by step he ascended the arena of responsibilities and public trust in his State. After serving upon the circuit court bench and in the State Legislature with peculiar adaptation and distinction, he was then honored with thirteen consecutive years in this body. Here he tied and endeared to him the hearts of not only his party friends, but all lovers of fair and just legislation, for upon all such issues, in Congress, he was positive, forcible, and outspoken, and on account of his ardent and unqualified devotion to the best interest of the common people of his district and State he was always more than a match for any scheme or combined political forces to defeat him before the people.

I have been familiarly acquainted with Judge Houk for several years, and there was one particular and grand trait of character about him which I very much admired; out of his broad and liberal heart always poured forth indications of sympathy and willingness to encourage and assist the poor and needy classes of the people, and as such they always looked to him for kind words and protection. The humblest peasant upon the streets could approach him with ease. He was perfectly friendly, courteous, and conservative in his views; he often expressed to me his desire to see our Government assist in some way in the elevation of the poor white and black people of our land. He thought it could best be accomplished through some educational measure by Congress, and although he was thoroughly conversant and alive upon all great issues before this body and the country, he was, nevertheless, awakened and mindful of the small and minor interests of the people.

He always argued with great force and clearness that the black man of this country had rights as an American citizen, and as such they should be respected and protected, and for further example of his interest in the welfare of the colored people, he thoroughly believed that the United States Government should reimburse the depositors the $3,000,000 which they lost in the United States Freedman's Savings Bank. For these liberal and just views the colored people in his district and State and in the United States, as far as they knew him, wish to pay through me this tribute of respect to his memory. They believe with me that such noble-hearted men, such lovers of right and justice to all classes and conditions of men, can not miss their reward in the great and sublime hereafter. [Applause.]

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the pending resolutions.

The resolutions were adopted; and the House then (at 4 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) adjourned.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL presented a petition of citizens of Windham County, Vt., praying for the passage of a law to prevent dealing in futures; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Windham County, Vt., praying for the passage of the Conger lard bill; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. CAMERON presented a joint petition of the Board of Trade, the Maritime Exchange, the Commercial Exchange, the Drug Exchange, the Manufacturers' Club, the Grocers and Importers' Exchange, the Board of Port Wardens, and the Vessel Owners and Captains' Association of Philadelphia, Pa., praying for the enactment of Senate joint resolution No. 23 relative to the improvement of the harbor of Philadelphia; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition signed by 197 citizens and 5 churches of Pennsylvania, a petition of the members of the Kensington Methodist Episcopal Church of Philadelphia, Pa., a petition of the Young People's Christian Endeavor Society of Birmingham, Pa., and a petition of the Young People's Christian Endeavor Society of Camptown, Pa., praying that the World's Columbian Fair be closed on Sunday; which were referred to the Committee on the Quadro-Centennial (Select).

He also presented a petition of the Young People's Christian Endeavor Society of Neath, Pa., a petition of the Young People's Christian Endeavor Society of East Smithfield, Pa., and a petition of the Young People's Christian Endeavor Society of Troy, Pa., praying for legislation to prevent the exportation of liquor to Africa; which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. DOLPH. I present a petition of the Indian war veterans of Oregon, who served in the Indian wars since the 3d day of March, 1855, praying that the act of Congress in force prior to the 3d day of March, 1855, granting land warrants to persons who served in the Indian wars, be extended or made applicable to the period between the 3d day of March, 1855, and the 1st day of December, 1857. I shall at an early day introduce a bill to carry out the prayer of the petition. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SAWYER presented a petition of citizens of Rock County, Wis., praying for the enactment of laws to suppress the exportation of alcoholic liquors to Africa; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. WASHBURN presented resolutions adopted by the Chamber of Commerce of Duluth, Minn., favoring the resolutions adopted by the river improvement convention held in Kansas City, Mo., December 15, 1891; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the Chamber of Commerce of Duluth, Minn., favoring the passage of the bill for the construction of a ship canal around Niagara Falls; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a memorial of the Board of Trade of Duluth, Minn., remonstrating against the passage of what is known as the option bill; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented the petition of J. W. Stoddard and 97 other citizens of North Dakota, praying for the passage of what is known as the option bill; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of Duluth, Minn., praying for the reduction of letter postage to 1 cent per ounce; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented a resolution of the Chamber of Commerce, of Duluth, Minn., favoring the repeal of section 24 of the timber-culture law; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. WILSON presented a petition of 29 citizens of Jones County, Iowa, praying for the passage of a bill similar to the one known in the Fifty-first Congress as the Conger lard bill; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented a petition of 29 citizens of Jones County, Iowa, and a petition of 11 citizens of Cherokee County, Iowa, praying for the passage of a bill similar to the one known in the Fifty-first Congress as the Butterworth option bill; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. GIBSON of Louisiana presented a petition of the American Medical Association praying Congress to create a cabinet officer to be known as medical secretary of public health; which was referred to the Committee on Epidemic Diseases.

Mr. DANIEL presented a petition of the General Assembly of Virginia, praying Congress to compensate the State of Virginia for property destroyed at the Virginia Military Institute by the Federal troops during the late war; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented the petition of the J. B. Pace Tobacco Company and other tobacco firms, of Richmond Va., praying for the passage of certain amendments to the tariff and tax act; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. VANCE, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1759) for the relief of the heirs of Nathaniel Magruder, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. BERRY, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 124) to provide for a building for the use of the post-office, the office of the superintendent of the Hot Springs Reservation, and the Government offices, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds; which was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1604) to provide for the creation of a fourth judicial district in the Territory of Utah, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1612) to compensate Thomas G. Hayes for legal services rendered under direction of the Attorney-General, reported it without amendment.

Mr. HARRIS, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1105) to incorporate the Washington and Deanwood Railway Company in the District of Columbia, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. MCMILLAN, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1492) to authorize the appointment of an inspector of plumbing in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1884) to prevent fraud upon the water revenues of the District of Columbia, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. ALLEN, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 218) granting to the county of Clallam, State of Washington, certain public lands in trust, and for other purposes, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. PASCO, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 44) for the relief of William Clift, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. DOLPH. By direction of a majority of the Committee on Public Lands I submit a favorable report on the bill (S. 622) to amend an act entitled "An act for the relief of certain settlers on the public lands and to provide for the repayment of certain fees, purchase money, and commissions paid on void entries of public lands."

Mr. BERRY. Is that the bill in regard to refunding money about forfeited lands?

Mr. DOLPH. It is.

Mr. BERRY. I desire to state that there is a minority report. There is no written report, but I wish it to be noted that there is a minority of the committee who do not agree to the favorable report.

Mr. DOLPH. I stated to the Senate that it is a majority report, and of course that carried the implication that a minority of the committee are opposed to the bill.

Mr. BERRY. All my purpose was to have it appear on the Calendar that there is a minority of the committee opposed to the bill, that the bill might not be passed in the absence of members of the committee. I did not hear the statement of the Senator from Oregon.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will not appear on the Calendar that there is a minority opposed to the bill, as there is no written report by majority or minority.

Mr. DOLPH. It is a bill that was early reported in the Senate during the last Congress and remained on the Calendar, never having been considered. Sometimes it was passed over when reached because it was understood that the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY] opposed the bill and desired to be heard upon it, and action upon it was postponed until so late that it was never taken up for consideration.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to suggest to the Senator from Arkansas that it can not appear on the Calendar that there is a minority report unless there is some writing filed to that effect.

Mr. BERRY. There is no written report submitted by the majority, I understand, and therefore the views of the minority will not be submitted in writing.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The statement as to the views of the minority will appear in the the RECORD, of course. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. DOLPH. From the same committee I report adversely on the bill (S. 217) for the relief of the purchasers from the United States of land in even-numbered sections within the forfeited portions of railroad grants, and the bill (S. 733) to reimburse settlers and purchasers of even-numbered sections of public lands within the limits of Congressional grants in cases of forfeiture of odd-numbered sections. These bills are reported adversely because, there being three bills on the subject, the majority of the committee prefer the bill which has been reported favorably.

The bills were postponed indefinitely.

Mr. VEST, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1934) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a court of private land claims, and to provide for the settlement of private land claims in certain States and Territories," approved March 3, 1891, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims; which was agreed to.

Mr. MANDERSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 621) to provide for the collection, custody, and arrangement of the records of the American Revolution, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

SENATOR FROM FLORIDA.

Mr. TURPIE, from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, to whom were referred the papers in the case of R. H. M. Davidson, contestant, against Wilkinson Call, contestee, concerning the right to a seat in the Senate from the State of Florida, submitted a report expressing "the opinion that Mr. Call was duly elected;" which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

DISTRICT FIRE INSURANCE COMPANIES.

Mr. VANCE. I am instructed by the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2785) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend the general incorporation law of the District of Columbia," approved May 17, 1882, to report it with an amendment, and to ask for its present consideration, for the reason that the purpose of the bill is to extend to the corporate existence of certain fire-insurance companies here which are about to expire, to their great injury and the injury of their policy-holders, and to place them upon an equality with the foreign fire insurance corporations which do business in this District, and which have an unlimited existence. As it is necessary to incorporate an amendment in the bill, in order to save time and to secure to these corporations a continued existence for the benefit of the present policy-holders, I am requested to ask that the bill be considered now.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for information, subject to objection.

The Chief Clerk read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment of the Committee on the District of Columbia will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. The committee report to add a new section as follows:

SEC. 3. Congress may at any time alter, amend, or repeal this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

COURTS IN NEW HAMPSHIRE.

Mr. WILSON. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 821) to provide for a term of the circuit and district court at Littleton, N. H., to report it favorably, without amendment.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask for the present consideration of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COURTS IN ARKANSAS.

Mr. WILSON. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3931) to detach Montgomery County from the western and add it to the eastern district of Arkansas, to report it favorably, without amendment.

Mr. BERRY. Inasmuch as early action is necessary on account of the time the courts are held there, I ask that the bill just reported favorably by the Senator from Iowa be considered now. It is a very important measure, and there is no objection from any quarter to the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

UMATILLA INDIAN RESERVATION LANDS.

Mr. DOLPH. By direction of the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1134) for the relief of purchasers of lands within the limits of the Umatilla Indian Reservation, I report it favorably, without amendment. It is a very short bill, and is the unanimous report of the committee. It is a matter to which no one will object, and it is important that it should be acted upon at once. I ask for the immediate consideration of the bill. Let it be read for information.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It provides that hereafter all necessary affidavits and proofs required by law of any purchaser of lands within the limits of the Umatilla Indian Reservation, in the State of Oregon, in order to perfect his title to the lands, may be made before any officer qualified to take proof in homestead cases.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PALMER. I ask that the bill lie on the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered.

Mr. DANIEL. I introduce two bills at the request of my colleague [Mr. BARBOUR], who is detained from the Senate by sickness.

The bill (S. 1994) for the relief of John H. Redman, a citizen of King George County, Va., was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. PERKINS. Early last month I had read at this desk a communication from our minister at Mexico, addressed to my late distinguished predecessor, Mr. Plumb, and it was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. I have now a joint resolution which I introduce, and there is also a communication accompanying it from Hon. William E. Curtis, of the State Department, which I should like to have read, to be referred with the joint resolution to the Committee on Foreign Relations or the Committee on Military Affairs; I am not certain as to which committee the reference should be made.

The joint resolution (S. R. 36) authorizing the President to return certain battle flags to the Republic of Mexico was read twice by its title.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The letter accompanying the joint resolution will be read, if there be no objection.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

BUREAU OF THE AMERICAN REPUBLICS,
DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, U. S. A., January 28, 1892.

DEAR SIR: According to a letter from the Secretary of War, dated January 19, 1889 (House Executive Document No. 102, Fiftieth Congress, second session), it appears that there are in the museum of the United States Military Academy at West Point, twenty-one flags, captured by the United States Army in the war with Mexico. These flags were presented to the Military Academy by the President of the United States, December 28, 1848.

I beg to suggest that the return of these trophies to the Government of Mexico, as advocated by your lamented predecessor, would be a most generous act on the part of the United States, and I submit herewith the draft of a joint resolution for that purpose.

Very truly, yours,

WILLIAM E. CURTIS.

To the Hon. BISHOP W. PERKINS,
United States Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the joint resolution, with the accompanying papers, be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

AMENDMENT TO A BILL.

Mr. CAMERON submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the agricultural appropriation bill; which was ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

PATENT OFFICE FUNDS.

Mr. FAULKNER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be requested to furnish the Senate, at as early a date as practicable, with a statement of the amount of all moneys received by the United States Patent Office from inventors since the establishment of that Bureau up to the present time; what disposition has been made of the same; the amount of the surplus on hand, if any, and how, and in what manner it is invested.

POTTAWATOMIE INDIAN AGREEMENT.

Mr. PERKINS submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed:

Resolved by the United States Senate, etc., That whereas the provisions of the articles of agreement by and between the United States and the citizen band of Pottawatomie Indians residing in Oklahoma Territory and elsewhere, ratified by Congress March 3, 1891, require that large sums of money be paid to them in said tract of country, which is construed to mean said Territory of Oklahoma; and whereas many members of said band of Indians reside in Kansas who through age, poverty, and sickness suffer great hardships by being compelled to go to said Territory to receive their payments: Therefore,

Resolved, That article 4 of said agreement b and the same is hereby construed so as to authorize and direct the proper officers of the Department of the Interior to make the payments as they fall due to the members of said band residing in Kansas at some point in their original reservation in said State as will accommodate the greatest number of said Indians.

DISTRICT SEWERAGE.

Mr. McMILLAN submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 700 additional copies of the report of the Board of Sanitary Engineers of the District of Columbia upon the sewerage of the District for the official use of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia.

EXECUTIVE BUSINESS.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask for the adoption of the following order:

Ordered, That Executive Document No. 23, Fifty-second Congress, first session, be withdrawn from the legislative files of the Senate and placed on the files of the executive clerk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The order will be agreed to, if there be no objection.

Mr. SHERMAN. What is the subject-matter of the document?

Mr. MORGAN. It is a message from the President of the United States relating to a claim of one of our citizens against a foreign government. It ought to be considered in executive session.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well. The order does not describe it at all.

The order was agreed to.

ENTRANCE TO YAQUINA BAY, OREGON.

Mr. MITCHELL. I offer the following resolution simply calling for information, and I ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish for the use of the Senate a copy of the report of Maj. G. L. Gillespie, United States Engineers, dated December 11, 1880, with the accompanying report of Assistant Engineer J. S. Polhemus, to the Chief of Engineers, on the subject of improving the entrance to Yaquina Bay, Oregon.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask if that information is not already in the report of the engineers?

Mr. MITCHELL. It is not and has never been printed. That is the reason why I offer the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE.

Mr. KYLE. I give notice that on Wednesday next I shall ask the courtesy of the Senate to make some remarks upon the joint resolution (S. R. 29) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, relating to marriage and divorce.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT RENO, NEV.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there be no further morning business that order is closed, and the consideration of the Calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

The Senate as in Committee of the Whole resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 56) for the erection of a public building at Reno, State of Nevada, the pending question being on the amendments reported by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, in line 11, before the word "thousand," strike out "one hundred" and insert the word "seventy-five;" so as to make the amount of the appropriation $75,000.

Mr. STEWART. During the discussion the other day I suggested that I would consent to reduce the amount of the appropriation to $60,000. I think with $60,000 we might get along. I want to be as economical as possible in regard to it. I think it is very essential that we should have a public building at that point. We need it very much. Reno is a growing town, and it will be undoubtedly the largest town between Sacramento and Salt Lake. I move to amend the amendment of the committee by striking out "seventy-five" and inserting "sixty."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 11 it is proposed to strike out "seventy-five," before the word "thousand," which was reported as an amendment by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and insert in lieu thereof "sixty;" so as to read:

The sum of $60,000, etc.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. STEWART. I wish to say before the bill is passed that when it was under consideration the other day some remarks were made by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. McPHERSON] with regard to the large appropriations asked for by California in the bills which are pending on the Calendar. I was about to remark or did remark then that California had been put off from time to time and had not received the necessary appropriations for public buildings, particularly in San Francisco. Since that matter has been brought to the attention of the Senate, I think it is but fair that the Senator from California [Mr. FELTON] should be allowed to make a statement as to how California has been dealt with in regard to these appropriations, and I yield to him to make such a statement.

Mr. FELTON. Mr. President, in this connection I desire to say that I listened with some attention to the remarks of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. McPHERSON] the other day in reference to the appropriations for public buildings in California, and it occurred to me if the facts as stated by the Senator were left unaccompanied by other facts relative thereto that the situation existing there might be misapprehended, that an impression might go abroad to the country and pervade the Senate that the State of California had been discriminated in favor of. Therefore I have gathered some statistics in relation to the matter which I desire to present to the Senate, and I apprehend that they will be sufficient to prove that the statement made by the Senator from New Jersey in relation to the State of California is not founded on fact. To say the least, it would be misleading.

I find that up to the year 1885 the appropriations for public buildings in the State of California amounted to $2,119,512.67. In the State of Illinois alone they amounted to $11,939,258.10 for two public buildings, and in the State of Louisiana to $4,808,202.06. It will be noted that the appropriations for Illinois for two public buildings were over five and a half times the amount of the appropriations for California, and that the appropriation for Louisiana of $4,808,202.06 is twice that of California.

In Massachusetts for one building the amount appropriated was $5,994,083, or two and a half times the amount appropriated for California. In the State of New York for two buildings there was appropriated $19,311,567.96, over nine times that of California. In Philadelphia for a post-office building alone there was appropriated $5,191,854, or nearly two and a half times the amount appropriated for California.

In the statement I have prepared will be found, in detail, the various buildings for which appropriations were made, and they are as follows:

Expenditures for public buildings to 1885.

At the risk of repeating myself, I will say that while the foregoing figures include all the appropriations for public buildings in California, save the United States mint, to the date named, it does not in the States subsequently mentioned, as there have been erected in them numerous buildings not specified and a number of them involving large expenditures of public moneys. I have simply used those that I deemed sufficient to demonstrate that there has been no discrimination in favor of California, but to the contrary.

I find that the money expended in nine States, with a less mileage of seacoast than that of California, on rivers and harbors, from 1789 to 1892, amounted to $42,090,765.60; whereas in the State of California for all the time up to 1882 there was appropriated for these purposes $1,493,428.58, and since that time $2,365,324, amounting to $3,858,752.54, or less than 10 per cent of the appropriations for the States above mentioned, as will be seen by the following statement, which I submit:

Money expended on rivers and harbors from 1789 to 1892.

Maine, to 1882	$1,404,889.36
Maine, to 1892	1,076,813.00

I find also that in the appropriations for the harbor of Galveston, in Texas, there was appropriated $4,068,218, or more than the entire appropriations for the State of California, including both rivers and harbors.

Texas: Galveston Harbor (alone), $4,068,218. (More than the entire appropriations for the State of California, including both rivers and harbors.)

I also find that the appropriations for the Mississippi River from 1881 to 1891 were as follows:

Appropriations for the Mississippi River, 1881–1891.

1882	2,142,995.60
1883	4,430,300.55
1884	2,517,480.79
1885	2,831,580.73
1886	423,563.29
1887	1,469,721.64
1888	$1,608,004.67
1889	2,456,312.67
1890	2,809,692.76
1891	2,894,689.00
	24,436,201.72

Total amount expended during the same period on the rivers in California, $726,736; less than 3 per cent.

Light-house appropriations made during the Fifty-first Congress.

1890	$1,017,100.00
1891	440,400.00
	1,457,500.00
1890—California	250.00
1891—California	30,000.00
	30,250.00

Or 2.06 per cent of the total, including a seacoast of nearly 1,000 miles.

For fortifications and buildings for military posts for sixteen years ending 1889.

Atlantic and Missouri Divisions	$20,501,769.37
Pacific Division	994,748.72
	21,496,518.09
	Per cent.
Atlantic and Missouri	95.79
Pacific	4.21
	100.00

The area of the Pacific Division is one-third that of the United States, 1,291,455 square miles, and there is not a protected harbor in 1,400 miles of coast.

I also find that from 1881 to 1891 California has paid into the Treasury of the United States nearly $118,000,000, as will be seen by the following statement.

Total receipts from customs and internal revenue paid into the United States Treasury from 1881 to 1892 by the State of California.

1882	12,036,828.75
1883	14,426,510.74
1884	10,443,498.05
1885	9,309,881.83
1886	8,033,961.13
1887	8,945,204.14
1888	11,651,280.55
1889	12,502,419.62
1890	10,518,209.67
1891	10,098,394.60
	117,937,015.82

This amounts to nearly ten and three-fourths millions per annum. One-half of the last year's payment, or 4½ per cent of the eleven years' payments, would be more than enough to pay for all the public buildings which California has asked for.

Mr. President, it is not my intention to take up the time of the Senate to discuss the merits of the bills which led to the remarks of the Senator from New Jersey. There will be time enough for that when the respective bills shall be under consideration by the Senate; but I will say that appropriations should be and usually are made for the necessities of the Government and for the benefit of the people at large. The nation has wealth enough to distribute in such shape as will be of advantage to the commercial interests of the country. I have instanced the case of Galveston and the Mississippi River, with no invidious purpose whatsoever, for I believe that these appropriations were wise. No Senator, I think, will contend that the preservation of that great valley and its great water ways for commercial purposes and to prevent a monopoly of transportation was unwise or that the great State of Texas and the commerce which goes to it should not be entitled to aid and to the advantages of a harbor which will let the products of that country out to the sea and to the world. Sir, in my opinion the amount of appropriations or the especial point or place of expenditure is measurably of less consequence than that the emergencies and necessities of the Government and the people be provided for, that the prosperity of both should not be impeded, but advanced.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS AT GRAND FORKS AND BISMARCK, N. DAK.

The bill (S. 591) to provide for the erection of a public building in the city of Grand Forks, N. Dak., was announced as next in order on the Calendar.

Mr. CASEY. I ask that the bill may go over without prejudice in the absence of my colleague [Mr. HANSBROUGH], who introduced it, and I make the same request with regard to the next bill on the Calendar, being the bill (S. 593) to provide for the erection of a public building in the city of Bismarck, N. Dak.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bills will be passed over, retaining their places on the Calendar, in the absence of objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. O. TOWLES, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed resolutions commemorative of the life and services of Hon. Leonidas Campbell Houk, late a Representative from the State of Tennessee.

The message also communicated to the Senate the intelligence of the death of Hon. Francis B. Spinola, late a Representative from the State of New York, and transmitted the resolutions of the House thereon.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT KANSAS CITY, KANS.

The bill (S. 1270) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Kansas City, in the State of Kansas, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with an amendment, in line 12, after the words "sum of," to strike out "three" and insert "two;" and in line 13, before the word "hundred," to strike out "three" and insert "two; "so as to read:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to acquire, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, a site, and cause to be erected thereon a suitable building, including fireproof vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, elevators, and approaches, for the use and accommodation of the United States post-office, custom-house, and other Government offices, in the city of Kansas City and State of Kansas, the cost of said site and building, including said vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, elevators, and approaches, complete, not to exceed the sum of $200,000, which said sum of $200,000 is hereby appropriated for said purpose out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, I see there is no written report with this bill. I should like to hear some explanation of it. What is the population of this town and the necessity for a public building there?

Mr. PEFFER. Mr. President, there was a report, but it was not printed. The report proposed to amend the bill by striking out the word "three" where it precedes the words "hundred thousand" and to insert the word "two," so as to make the proposed appropriation $200,000 instead of $300,000, and with that amendment recommending the passage of the bill, as I understand.

A bill substantially the same passed the Senate during the last session, but by reason of the pressure of other business failed to pass the other House.

Kansas City is made up of three towns incorporated by a special act of the Legislature of Kansas in 1886. The population of the place is something over 38,000, as shown by the national census of 1890. The amount of business done by the post-office, in dollars and cents, the last year was something over $30,000. But that, as I am informed, does not state accurately all of the business done, for the reason that a portion of the city is without very good transportation facilities and station aids, and on account of that difficulty part of the business that properly belongs there is transacted on the other side of the line, and goes to the post-office at Kansas City, Mo.

We have twenty-six school buildings at Kansas City, Kans.; we have six of the seven large packing houses there; we have six of the seven large elevators, and indeed share very largely the wonderful business that concentrates at that point between Kansas City, Mo., and Kansas City, Kans.; and we are without a public building of any sort. I understand that my colleague [Mr. PERKINS], who is temporarily absent, will be glad to say something on the bill, and in order that he may have an opportunity to do so, I ask that the bill may be passed over for the present, retaining its place on the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over without prejudice, retaining its place on the Calendar.

Mr. PERKINS subsequently said: I ask unanimous consent that the Senate return to the consideration of Senate bill 1270, which was temporarily laid aside.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1270) to provide for the purchase of a site, and the erection of a public building thereon, at Kansas City, in the State of Kansas.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, I desire to say in addition to what has been said that Kansas City, Kans., is an old historic city, on the opposite side of the Kansas River from Kansas City, Mo., and is the largest city in our State and is a growing, thriving commercial city. This bill passed the Senate at the first session of the Fiftieth Congress and has been reported twice favorably by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds in the House of Representatives. However, on the recommendation of that committee it was reported back for $150,000 rather than $200,000 in the House of Representatives, but the amount that is asked for now is the same as was given by the bill as it was passed by the Senate in the last Congress. Taking into consideration the commercial and business interests of that city, its population, its growth and importance, I think the amount covered by the bill as recommended for amendment by the committee is not an extravagant or exorbitant amount, and I hope that the bill will be passed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment reported by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, which has been stated.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

OBE SUTHERLAND.

The bill (S. 1379) to provide for a pension for Obe Sutherland, late a teamster in the Quartermaster's Department of the United States Volunteer Army, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, in line 6 before the word "dollars," to strike out "one hundred" and insert "fifty;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay Obe Sutherland, late a teamster in the Quartermaster's Department of the United State Volunteer Army, a pension of $50 per month.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. VEST subsequently said: I notice that there was a mistake in the verbiage of the bill (S. 1379) to provide for a pension for Obe Sutherland, late a teamster in the Quartermaster's Department of the United States Volunteer Army, which I did not know of until a few moments ago, and I ask for a reconsideration of the vote by which the bill was passed for the purpose of amending it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PASCO in the chair). If there be no objection the vote by which the bill was passed and also the vote by which it was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading will be regarded as reconsidered, and the bill opened to amendment. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. VEST. I now offer the amendments which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 3, in lieu of the word "Treasury," it is proposed to insert "Interior;" and in line 4, after the words "directed to," to strike out "pay" and insert "place the name of;" and after the word "army," in line 6, to insert "on the pension roll and pay him;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place the name of Obe Sutherland, late a teamster in the Quartermaster's Department of the United States volunteer army, on the pension roll and pay him a pension of $50 per month.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LIGHT-HOUSE ON NORTH HEAD, WASHINGTON.

The bill (S. 1503) to establish a first-order light-house on North Head, Cape Disappointment, in the State of Washington, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT PENSACOLA, FLA.

The bill (S. 80) providing for the completion of the public building in the city of Pensacola, Fla., as originally designed, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INDIAN HOSTILITIES IN NEVADA.

The bill (S. 53) to reimburse certain persons who expended moneys and furnished services and supplies in repelling invasions and suppressing Indian hostilities within the territorial limits of the present State of Nevada was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ALLISON. Let the report be read in that case.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The report will be read.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator from Iowa has called for the reading of the report; but it is a very voluminous report, I discover, and will consume the remainder of the time of the morning hour, and probably it will be as satisfactory to the Senator from Iowa and to the Senate that the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] who made the report should explain the bill. A great deal of time can be saved by an explanation.

Mr. STEWART. I can make an explanation in a few words. In the spring of 1860 an Indian war broke out in Nevada. The settlers were attacked and they raised a company of about seventy-five or one hundred men, who pursued the Indians. A battle ensued, and some sixty of our best citizens were killed in that battle and but fifteen or twenty of the officers who went out to fight escaped. The snow was very deep and the mountains almost impassable. Volunteers came from California, and Capt. Stewart brought a strong company of regulars. The volunteers organized under Col. Hayes, a celebrated Texan ranger, who understood the business thoroughly. Col. Hayes's services were accepted by Capt. Stewart of the regular Army. There was no possibility of getting supplies over the mountains, which were practically impassable. The snow was soft and very deep, and it became necessary for the Nevadians to supply the volunteer army and also the regular Army, but the supplies for the regular Army were paid for at the time but the supplies for the volunteer army were not paid for.

This bill is not for the Indian depredations, but is for supplies furnished and labor which was employed by Col. Hayes in this expedition for which about three hundred men were raised. They pursued the Indians, had several skirmishes, and a number of men were killed. When the Indians saw the number of whites arrayed against them they made peace, which has ever since been maintained.

This claim was presented to Congress by me soon after Nevada was admitted as a State, but the testimony in it was very voluminous as to these various items, as will be seen, and I advised the State to pass a law and to call witnesses and to have these claims examined individually, as it would be a very long and difficult undertaking to examine them here. So the State passed a law authorizing a board of examiners, which examined all the claims in that State, consisting of the governor, the secretary of state, and the attorney-general. The parties were notified, they appeared with their witnesses, and the testimony was taken as to each one of these claims.

There were contained in their report some items for Indian depredations, but the committee in the Fiftieth Congress examined the report and eliminated all the items for Indian depredations, confining it simply to supplies and labor furnished to Col. Hayes's army, which was assisting the United States forces.

The same bill was reported favorably in the Fiftieth Congress and passed the Senate. It was again reported favorably by the Senator from Oregon in the Fifty-first Congress and passed. It has passed the Senate twice. It has been reported favorably twice in the other House, and has been thoroughly examined. The evidence as to each item is contained in the testimony in addition to the reports of the board of examiners, so I think there was no item in the bill but what is a legitimate claim against the United States.

The precedents for this are not very numerous, but they cover all the cases where like transactions occurred in Montana and several other States and Territories, where the services of volunteer soldiers had been accepted by the regular Army, and where they had coöperated with them and supplies were furnished to them that could not be paid for by the regular Army officers, although they paid for the supplies of the regular Army. They could not, however, pay for the others. Congress has in each case when a claim of that kind has been presented paid it.

So we have brought this case entirely within the ordinary precedents for payment, because there is no reason why those who furnished supplies to the volunteer forces coöperating with the regular Army should not be paid any more than those who furnished supplies to the regular Army. They acted together in this case as one army, and did effective service and obtained peace, and the Government has been at no expense of any Indian war there since that time.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to ask if there is—though I believe there is not—any allowance of interest?

Mr. STEWART. There is no allowance of interest.

Mr. COCKRELL. I see the board that met there in the State of Nevada to adjudicate these claims reported interest much larger than the claims.

Mr. STEWART. We cut off all the interest. There is no interest allowed.

Mr. COCKRELL. No interest allowed?

Mr. STEWART. There is no interest allowed.

Mr. COCKRELL. Is Mr. Stivers's claim for boarding regular Army officers included in this?

Mr. STEWART. No.

Mr. CHANDLER. I notice this bill appropriates $29,144. I should like to ask the Senator from Nevada whether there was not a great deal more money expended by citizens of Nevada and others in this outbreak for which no reimbursement has been asked for?

Mr. STEWART. Oh, yes; several hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. CHANDLER. Is it or is it not his intention to have this as a settlement of all the claims by his State?

Mr. STEWART. So far as these claims are concerned, it is a settlement. There are few others of a similar character that may be presented in the course of time, but they do not amount to very much. The great majority of the contributions were made voluntarily and without any expectation of any return. I contributed myself a thousand dollars.

Mr. CHANDLER. Furnished by citizens who have no idea of presenting a claim?

Mr. STEWART. I have no idea whatever as to that. The great mass of citizens of California who contributed kept no account of the money they contributed. The claims presented to Congress will not amount to 25 per cent of the money actually expended, because the great mass of the people gave the money on subscription without regard to reimbursement. But this bill provides for persons in Nevada who were poor people and furnished all they had.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator has introduced a bill for the Indian depredation claims, this claims of private citizens for losses happening in the outbreak, which has been referred to the Committee on Indian Depredations. I understand the Senator that those claims grew out of this same affair.

Mr. STEWART. There were Indian depredations in that case and others, but they are different altogether.

Mr. CHANDLER. But when these cases are disposed of and this bill passes, I understand the Senator that it is not expected that other claims will be presented for the large sums expended.

Mr. STEWART. No. I say there are a few claims that have been adjusted as I understand by the board—very few—which perhaps are not included in this bill. They were adjusted afterwards, but they will amount to very little. The business of the board is closed. I have not got them, or I should put them in this bill, but the great mass of expenditures made on that occasion Congress will never be called upon to pay, because no account was kept of them and nobody expected any return. The money was given for a public purpose entirely at the time, and no account was kept. Those claims which have not been presented and investigated up to this time will not be presented at all. It is now too late.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT CHEYENNE, WYO.

The bill (S. 522) for the erection of a public building at Cheyenne, Wyo., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with amendments. The first amendment was, in line 12, before the word "hundred," to strike out "two" and insert "one;" so as to read:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to acquire, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, a site, and cause to be erected thereon a suitable building, including fire-proof vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, elevators, and approaches, for the use and accommodation of the United States courts, post-office, and other Government offices in the city of Cheyenne, and State of Wyoming, the cost of said site and building, including said vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, elevators, and approaches, complete, not to exceed the sum of $150,000, which said sum is hereby appropriated for said purpose out of any moneys in the United States Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on line 67, after "United States," to insert:

nor until the State of Wyoming shall have ceded to the United States exclusive jurisdiction over the same during the time the United States shall be or remain the owner thereof, for all purposes except the administration of the criminal laws of said State and the service of civil process therein.

So as to read:

No money appropriated by this act shall be available, except as hereinbefore provided, until a valid title to the site for said building shall be vested in the United States, nor until the State of Wyoming shall have ceded to the United States exclusive jurisdiction over the same during the time the United States shall be or remain the owner thereof, for all purposes except the administration of the criminal laws of said State and the service of civil process therein.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CAREY. I offer an amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FAULKNER in the chair). The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, line 12, it is proposed to amend by striking out "one" and inserting "two;" and in line 13 by striking out "fifty" before "thousand;" so as to read:

Two hundred thousand dollars.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair calls the attention of the Senator from Wyoming to the fact that one of the amendments on the subject of which he offers an amendment has been agreed to in Committee of the Whole, and the amendment that he offers will not be in order until the bill has been reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. COCKRELL. What is the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wyoming?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PASCO in the chair). The amendment made as in Committee of the Whole will first be stated.

Mr. COCKRELL. What was the amendment made in Committee of the Whole?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment made in Committee of the Whole will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 12, before the word "hundred" the Senate as in Committee of the Whole struck out "two" and inserted "one" so as to make the amount $150,000.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is right.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the amendment in line 12, by striking out the word "one" before "hundred" and inserting "two;" and in line 13, by striking out the words "and fifty" before "thousand," so as to make the appropriation read "$200,000."

Mr. PLATT. Is that the way the bill was originally reported?

Mr. COCKRELL. No, it was reported at $150,000. We ought to have an explanation of why this $50,000 additional is wanted.

Mr. CAREY. I will state to the Senator that I was not present when the bill was ordered to be reported by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. The bill was introduced providing for an appropriation of $250,000.

I will say to the Senate that Cheyenne had, according to the last census, a population of 12,600. The United States is paying rents in the town of about $8,000 per annum. United States courts are held there. The Government, I think, is paying $1,800 per annum for a post-office. There is a land office in the town; there is a signal station there, and the Government is paying rent for the surveyor-general's office. I do not believe that $200,000 is more than sufficient to erect a proper building in that city, which is the capital of the State. For these reasons I have moved the amendment.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to ask if those reasons were presented to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and, if so, what action that committee took? We certainly ought to pay some attention to the reports of that committee, for I am certain they are liberal, to say the least.

Mr. CAREY. I will state to the Senator from Missouri that when the committee made up their report I was not present. The report was made at the last Congress when the State was a Territory, on a basis of population 25 per cent less than the census of two years ago shows. I believe, taking the rule which governs in the reporting of these bills, that this city is entitled to an appropriation of the full amount of $250,000 originally provided for in the bill as introduced. Now I have moved an amendment to make the amount $200,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole, in line 12, before the word "hundred," to strike out "two" and insert "one." If that amendment is adopted, it will leave the amount $150,000.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, I should like to inquire about the parliamentary condition of this matter. As I understand, the bill as originally introduced provided for an appropriation of $250,000. The committee reported an amendment, which would make it $150,000, and in the Committee of the Whole that has been acted upon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on concurring in that amendment.

Mr. PLATT. Now the Senator from Wyoming has offered an amendment making the sum $200,000. Should not that be acted upon as an amendment to the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole? Does it not come up in that form? I am not entirely familiar with the parliamentary way of proceeding, but it seems to me that is the proper method.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The general practice is to act first upon the committee amendments. The same result will be reached by concurring or nonconcurring in the committee amendments.

Mr. PLATT. Then the amendment of the Senator from Wyoming will be in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Then the amendment of the Senator from Wyoming will come up. The question is on concurring in the amendments of the committee.

Mr. CAREY. When I wished to offer the amendment in the first instance, it was stated by the Chair that the proper time for that amendment would be when the bill had been reported to the Senate after the amendments of the committee had been considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments of the committee are now being considered in the Senate. After the amendments of the committee have been considered, then the amendment of the Senator from Wyoming will be in order.

Mr. CAREY. Now I should like to ask if an amendment is order to the amendment proposed by the committee?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator desires to move an amendment in that form, he can do so.

Mr. CAREY. I will make that motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 12, it is proposed to strike out the word "one," before "hundred," and insert "two;" and in line 13, before the word "thousand," to strike out "fifty;" so as to read: "$200,000."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Wyoming to the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope the Senator will not press that amendment. Here we have a committee of the Senate who have deliberately considered this bill, and they have reported $150,000 instead of $250,000. Now, without any action on the part of that committee, the Senator moves to change that to $200,000, increasing it $50,000 above what the committee recommend, without any information at all as to the views of the committee or the propriety or impropriety of it. We might just as well have no committee at all.

I would suggest that the Senator allow this bill to remain on the Calendar and that he go before the committee and see if they will sanction his amendment. I think that would be fairer. It places Senators in a very awkward situation for those representing States whenever a public building bill comes up from their States to get up and move a change in the amount which the committee report without any recommendation from the committee. It places every Senator in an awkward position, and I think it is due to the Senate that the course I have suggested hould be pursued.

Mr. CAREY. I am not very familiar with the rules of the Senate. I ask if the bill is passed over by consent at this time, will it be at all prejudiced?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be without prejudice.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have no objection, but I suggest that the Senator let the bill retain its place on the Calendar, that it be passed over without objection. Then it can be called up at any time in the morning hour and be under the same rule as it is now.

Mr. CAREY. I have no objection to that course.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. At the request of the Senator from Wyoming the bill will be passed over without prejudice, retaining its place on the Calendar.

DENNIS MURPHY.

The bill (S. 211) for the relief of the sureties of Dennis Murphy was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to release the sureties of Dennis Murphy, who was formerly paymaster and military storekeeper at the national armory at Harpers Ferry, Va., upon his official bond to the United States, executed April 28, 1858.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FOOD AND DRUG ADULTERATION.

The bill (S. 1) for preventing the adulteration and misbranding of food and drugs, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. PADDOCK. I ask that the amendment which I reported, being in the nature of a substitute for the bill, may be read and considered in connection with the original bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment reported by the committee will be stated.

The amendment reported by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and insert:

That, for the purpose of protecting the commerce in food products and drugs between the several States and Territories of the United States and foreign countries, the Secretary of Agriculture shall organize in the Department of Agriculture a section to be known as the food section of the chemical division, and make necessary rules governing the same, to carry out the provisions of this act under direction of the chief chemist, whose duty it shall be to procure from time to time, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture, and analyze or cause to be analyzed or examined samples of food and drugs sold or offered for sale in any State or Territory other than where manufactured. The Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized to employ such chemists, inspectors, clerks, laborers, and other employés as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act.

SEC. 2. That the introduction into any State or Territory from any other State or Territory or foreign country of any article of food or drugs which is adulterated or misbranded within the meaning of this act is hereby prohibited, and any person who shall knowingly ship or deliver for shipment from any State or Territory or foreign country to any other State or Territory, or who shall knowingly receive in any State or Territory from any other State or Territory or foreign country, or who, having so received, shall knowingly deliver, for pay or otherwise, or offer to deliver to any other person, any such article so adulterated or misbranded within the meaning of this act, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and for such offense be fined not exceeding $200 for the first offense, and for each subsequent offense not exceeding $300, or be imprisoned not exceeding one year, or both, in the discretion of the court.

SEC. 3. That the chief chemist shall make, or cause to be made, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture, examinations of specimens of food and drugs which may be collected from time to time, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture, and under his direction in various parts of the country, and publish in bulletins the results of such analyses. But the names of manufacturers or venders of such foods or drugs analyzed shall in no case be published in such bulletins until after conviction in the courts of violation of this act. If it shall appear from such examination that any of the provisions of this act have been violated the Secretary of Agriculture shall at once cause a report of the fact to be made to the proper United States district attorney, with a copy of the results of the analysis duly authenticated by the analyst under oath.

SEC. 4. That it shall be the duty of every district attorney to whom the food section shall report any violation of this act to cause proceedings to be commenced and prosecuted without delay for the fines and penalties in such case provided, unless, upon inquiry and examination, he shall decide that such proceedings can not probably be sustained, in which case he shall report the facts to the food section.

SEC. 5. That the term "drug," as used in this act, shall include all medicines for internal or external use. The term "food," as used herein, shall include all articles used for food or drink by man, whether simple, mixed, or compound. The term "misbranded," as used herein, shall include all drugs, or articles of food, or which enter into the composition of food, the package or label of which shall bear any statement purporting to name any ingredients or substances as not being contained in such article, which statement shall be false in any particular; or any statement purporting to name the substances of which such article is made, which statement shall not fully give the names of all the substances contained in such article in any measurable quantities.

SEC. 6. That for the purposes of this act an article shall be deemed to be adulterated—

In case of drugs:

First. If when sold under or by a name recognized in the United States Pharmacopœia it differs from the standard of strength, quality, or purity according to the tests laid down therein.

Second. If when sold under or by a name not recognized in the United States Pharmacopœia, but which is found in some other pharmacopœia or other standard work on materia medica, it differs materially from the standard of strength, quality, or purity, according to the tests laid down in said work.

Third. If its strength or purity fall below the professed standard under which it is sold.

Fourth. If it be an imitation of and sold under the specific name of another article.

In case of food or drink:

First. If any substance or substances has or have been mixed and packed with it so as to reduce or lower or injuriously affect its quality or strength, so that such product, when offered for sale, shall be calculated and shall tend to deceive the purchaser.

Second. If any inferior substance or substances has or have been substituted wholly or in part for the article, so that the product, when sold, shall tend to deceive the purchaser.

Third. If any valuable constituent of the article has been wholly or in part abstracted, so that the product, when sold, shall tend to deceive the purchaser.

Fourth. If it be an imitation of and sold under the specific name of another article.

Fifth. If it be mixed, colored, powdered, or stained in a manner whereby damage is concealed, so that such product, when sold, shall tend to deceive the purchaser.

Sixth. If it contain any added poisonous ingredient or any ingredient which may render such article injurious to the health of the person consuming it.

Seventh. If it consists of the whole or any part of a diseased, filthy, decomposed, or putrid animal or vegetable substance, or any portion of an animal unfit for food, whether manufactured or not, or if it is the product of a diseased animal, or of an animal that has died otherwise than by slaughter: Provided, That an article of food or drug which does not contain any added poisonous ingredient shall not be deemed to be adulterated—

First, in the case of mixtures or compounds which may be now or from time to time hereafter known as articles of food under their own distinctive names, and not included in definition fourth of this section;

Second, in the case of articles labeled, branded, or tagged, so as to plainly indicate that they are mixtures, compounds, combinations, or blends;

Third, when any matter or ingredient has been added to the food or drug because the same is required for the production or preparation thereof as an article of commerce in a state fit for carriage for consumption, and not fraudulently to increase the bulk, weight, or measure of the food or drug, or conceal the inferior quality thereof: Provided, That the same shall be labeled, branded, or tagged, as prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture, so as to show them to be compounds and the exact character thereof: And provided further, That nothing in this act shall be construed as requiring or compelling proprietors or manufacturers of proprietary medicines to disclose their trade formulas;

Fourth, where the food or drug is unavoidably mixed with some extraneous matter in the process of collection or preparation.

SEC. 7. That every person manufacturing or exposing for sale or delivering to a purchaser any drug or article of food included in the provisions of this act shall furnish a sample of such drugs or articles of food to any person duly authorized by the Secretary of Agriculture to receive the same, and who shall apply to such manufacturer or vender, or person delivering to a purchaser such drug or article of food for such sample for such use, in sufficient quantity for the analysis of any such article or articles in his possession, and shall tender him the full value thereof. And in the presence of such dealer and an agent of the food section, if so desired by either party, said sample shall be divided into three parts and each part shall be sealed by the seal of the food section. One part shall be left with the dealer, one delivered to the food section, and one deposited with the United States district attorney for the district in which the sample is taken. Said manufacturer or dealer may have the sample left with him analyzed at his own expense, and if the results of said analysis differ from those of the food section, the sample in the hands of the district attorney shall be analyzed by a third chemist, who shall be appointed by the president of the Association of Official Agricultural Chemists of the United States, in the presence of the chemist of the food section and the chemist representing the dealer, and the whole evidence shall be laid before the court.

SEC. 8. That whoever refuses to comply, upon demand, with the requirements of section 7 of this act shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction, shall be fined not exceeding one hundred nor less than ten dollars or imprisoned not exceeding one hundred nor less than thirty days, or both, And any person found guilty of manufacturing, or knowingly offering for sale, or selling an adulterated, impure, or misbranded article of food or drug under the provisions of this act shall be adjudged to pay, in addition to the penalties heretofore provided for, all the necessary costs and expenses incurred in inspecting and analyzing such adulterated articles which said person may have been found guilty of manufacturing, selling, or offering for sale.

SEC. 9. That in prosecutions for violations of any of the provisions of this act proof of the act done shall be held to imply knowledge and intent on the part of the accused, unless such knowledge and intent shall be disproved on the trial. If it be shown that said dealer is innocent of any intentional fraud, then the action in court shall lie against the dealers having furnished the accused the articles in question, and these dealers shall be parties to the suit.

SEC. 10. That this act shall not be construed to interfere with commerce wholly internal in any State, nor with the exercise of their police powers by the several States.

SEC. 11. That for the purpose of enabling the Secretary of Agriculture to carry this law into effect, there is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $100,000.

Mr. COKE. That bill should not be taken up during the morning hour. It is a bill of too much importance and will require too much discussion to be disposed of hastily. I therefore object to its consideration during the morning hour.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made to the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. PADDOCK. I hope the Senator will withdraw his objection for a moment.

Mr. COKE. I will withdraw the objection in order that the Senator may make a statement.

Mr. PADDOCK. Two weeks ago I gave notice to the Senate that when this bill was reached regularly on the Calendar, I should move that its consideration be proceeded with and its consideration continued until the bill should be disposed of.

I do not wish now, however, to interject this important measure into the morning order of business. I do not wish to antagonize bills which, because they are not important enough to be strongly antagonized, may with brief consideration be passed in the morning hour. Besides, as I understand my friend from Texas [Mr. COKE] is not well, and desires to speak upon this bill briefly, I do not care to press the consideration of it at this time, even without objection, in the morning hour, but I do desire, inasmuch as the amendment has been partially read, that the reading may be completed so that it may appear in the RECORD, and then I will consent to an agreement about its future consideration. I shall ask that the bill be made the special order immediately after the conclusion of the consideration of the printing bill, so called, which follows immediately after the bill which is the the order at 2 o'clock to-day.

Mr. COKE. I shall make no objection to that, but——

Mr. PADDOCK. That is all I desire, but I shall be obliged to the Senator if he will allow the reading of the amendment to be concluded now.

Mr. COKE. I ask the Senator if he can not name a day when the question shall come up.

Mr. PADDOCK. I can name a day, and it is the very day and the very hour when the consideration of the printing bill, which is the next special order, shall have reached a conclusion; but I can not consent, and the Senator from Texas ought not to appeal to me to put this bill off a single minute longer that that, which may and probably will carry it over three or four days.

I do not know how long it will take to consider the printing bill. It will lead to some discussion, I have no doubt. The bill now before the Senate, however, has been before the country for a great many months, and it has been before the Senate for a good many months. It was considered, not very much at length, to be sure, at the last session of Congress, and I spoke quite at length upon it on the last day of the session. I have no speech to make upon it myself now, and I shall consume no time in its consideration except in answering what may be said by its opponents very briefly. But the country wants this legislation, and the need of it is apparent to every man, woman, and child of intelligence in the country. There is a universal demand for it from the State and county agricultural associations of the whole country.

Reputable people who are engaged in the various vocations which are to be specially affected by it—the National Dairy Association, the National Association of Druggists—have signified their desire that Congress pass the bill.

The National Grocers' Association has made a similar appeal, and appeals have come from honorable dealers, manufacturers, and others, and from every part of the country. The great army of consumers have universally demanded its passage. The bill ought to have taken precedence of many bills which have been already considered here this session. I can consent to no arrangement other than that the measure shall be placed for consideration immediately after the consideration of the printing bill shall be concluded. Beyond this I am unwilling to make any agreement whatever. The Senate can vote the bill up or down as it may please, but I must insist on the opportunity being presented for such vote; and it will have to be given, or refused to be given, very soon.

Mr. COKE. I regard the bill as a very vicious one, indeed. I do not think there is a worse bill on the Calendar than this, and I know of no public sentiment that demands it. The sentiment the Senator from Nebraska refers to may exist, but, if it does, I have never heard of it.

Mr. PADDOCK. Ten thousand petitions have come before Congress in favor of it.

Mr. COKE. It is a very important bill, one that ought to be thoroughly considered and discussed, and I think the Senate ought to be allowed sufficient time in which to do it.

Mr. PADDOCK. I am ready to accede to that. I do not deny for a moment that Senators, like my friend from Texas, who may wish to discuss this bill should have full and ample opportunity to do so, but I do insist that that time shall commence speedily.

Mr. PLATT. I wish to make a suggestion to the Senator from Nebraska. I think if he will ask that the pending bill be made the special order of the day for Wednesday—we can not consider it before—then it will stand on the Calendar as being the next business after the printing bill.

Mr. PADDOCK. I will very cheerfully agree to that.

Mr. BATE. I do not think that will answer. That is only the day after to-morrow. I do not know how long the printing bill will take, but this is certainly a bill of vast importance. As has been said by the Senator from Nebraska, it is a bill that was here at the last session and he made his speech upon it on the last day of the session. I remember that very distinctly. The bill, however, has been brought in at this session with material changes, which ought to be understood and ought to be investigated. I think there ought to be a written report upon it, but it has not come into the Senate at this session with a written majority and minority report as it did last session. The other bill had both a majority and minority report with it, and there is no report here, so far as I know, to enlighten the Senate as to the opinion of the committee. The bill, as I have said, is now submitted without any report and without, I believe, the Senator having spoken upon it at this session. I belong to that committee——

Mr. PADDOCK. Mr. President——

Mr. BATE. Excuse me. I believe at the last session, when it was a matter of so much interest here, as it is now, there was a majority report made and there was likewise a minority report, and I was one of the members of the committee who signed the latter. Now the bill is here with some material changes, as I understand, though I have not had an opportunity to compare the bills. I think we ought to have time to investigate the matter, and I ask for nothing else, because we have to meet the question. I state frankly that I oppose the bill myself, and I have reasons for that opposition which I expect to be able to give at the proper time.

Mr. PADDOCK. The bill is here reported favorably by the majority of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. It was reported in the same way at the last session when a very reasonable report was made on behalf of the majority by myself, and a very able, a very learned, and very exhaustive minority report was made by my distinguished friend from Tennessee [Mr. BATE]. It is understood that my report on behalf of the majority of the committee which was made at the last session will be the majority report for this session. There are no material changes in the bill, but whatever changes have occurred in it are in the direction of the better protection of the interests which my friend on the other side may happen to represent. If there is any change it has been to liberalize the bill on lines which he has adopted as his lines of antagonism to legislation of this character whatever its form may be. So that his minority report, a very able report from his standpoint, made at the last session, can very properly be considered as being made now, as the majority report made at the last session is to be so considered.

Before I take my seat I will make the motion that the pending bill, Senate bill No. 1, be made the special order for Wednesday next.

Mr. BATE. I object to that for the reasons I have stated.

Mr. PADDOCK. I make the motion that Senate bill No. 1 be made the special order for Wednesday next immediately after the completion of the consideration of the printing bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Senate bill No. 1, being under consideration, the Senator from Nebraska moves that it be made the special order for Wednesday next at 2 o'clock. The Chair understands that it takes a two-thirds vote to do that.

Mr. BATE. If the motion is insisted upon, I shall, under the circumstances, call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. PLATT. Is debate in order on that motion?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that debate is in order.

Mr. PLATT. If not, I trust I may have unanimous consent to say a word.

I do not know whether I am in favor of this bill or not, but it is a bill in which there is a large public interest and which is entitled to a hearing. I made the suggestion to the Senator from Nebraska that to get a hearing at any reasonable time during this session it would be well to make a motion to have the bill made the special order of the day for Wednesday next. Manifestly it will not be heard then, but it will take its place after the present unfinished business shall have been disposed of and the printing bill shall have been disposed of, and, as things have been going on here in the Senate, it will be a good many days before this bill will be reached for consideration. I suppose that enough time will elapse so that all the Senators desiring to consider the bill and to get ready for its consideration will have ample opportunity.

The La Abra claim bill is to be disposed of to-day, I suppose. The printing bill will take some days. By the time that is out of the way I should suppose that all members of the Senate could be ready to consider this bill. I think it is entitled to consideration. That was my only reason for making the suggestion to the Senator. I do not know whether I am in favor of the bill as a whole, or not.

Mr. PADDOCK. My motion was made in pursuance of the suggestion of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT].

I desire to say to our friends upon the other side who wish to antagonize this bill, that if they will allow it to be taken up and allow the order to be made as proposed, as far as I am concerned I will yield to the convenience of any one on the other side who may wish to have a little time to discuss it. If any Senator is not prepared to discuss the bill I shall be willing to yield reasonably, as I have generally done all the way through, with this bill. There is no bill whose friends have exercised greater courtesy or who have made greater concessions than have been made as to this bill. All I wish is that the bill shall have its due and proper place, the place to which it is so justly entitled by its very great importance. I will consent at all times to consult the convenience of our friends on the other side as to their discussion, so long as such discussions are not indulged simply to obstruct its passage; and I am sure this will not be attempted.

MEXICAN COMMISSION AWARDS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is the bill (S. 539) to amend and enlarge the act approved June 18, 1878, entitled "An act to provide for the distribution of the awards made under the convention between the United States of America and the Republic of Mexico," concluded on the 4th day of July, 1868, the pending question being on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] to strike out section 3 of the bill, on which the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, in the absence of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], the duty devolves on me to present some considerations to the Senate why the third section of the bill, which provides for an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, should be stricken out. To go into that matter and into all the law which is applicable to that question would take more time than is allotted to me this morning. Only one more hour remains for debate on this question. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] desires also to address the Senate, and I shall therefore present my views as briefly as I can.

At the outset I desire to say that I have listened to the debates upon the merits of these two claims for two or three times. I have heard the evidence upon which it is relied to show that these claims are insincere and fraudulent discussed with great ability and with great clearness by the Senators who have spoken in favor of this bill, and I am satisfied that both claims are utterly without foundation; that the honor of the Government of the United States requires that these claims should be investigated and that restitution be made to Mexico. I am so fully satisfied upon the evidence as produced that there is neither equity nor justice in either claim that I should be willing to vote for a bill, without any further investigation, returning the money which has thus been unlawfully and iniquitously gotten from the Republic of Mexico; but it has been deemed proper by the committee in charge of this measure to provide for a further investigation, and I vote for that.

In order that my position may be accurately understood, I ought to state to the Senate the attitude in which these cases stand so far as the Government of the United States is concerned. It is to protect the honor and the good faith of the Government of the United States that any legislation is needed. That Mexico in any proceeding of a purely municipal nature could not succeed in setting aside the award, I agree. The terms of the convention in the strongest possible language fix the finality and conclusiveness of the decisions of the Joint Commission, and if it were a proceeding in a court of equity on the part of Mexico to set aside this award upon the ground of fraud, I admit that such a bill could not be maintained; but that is not the attitude of the question before the Senate. The preamble to the bill rightly states——

Mr. SHERMAN. I shall probably be called out in a few minutes on a matter of public business, and if the Senator will allow me five minutes upon this question, we can then resume the floor, if it will not interrupt him in his argument.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. GEORGE. I do.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, as a matter of justice to a constituent of mine, and to present fairly upon the record one of the matters which has been brought out in the La Abra case, I have taken the liberty of asking the indulgence of my friend to allow this gentleman to set himself and his firm right. He is of the firm of Shellabarger & Wilson, who are known to be a very respectable firm, both being ex-members of the House of Representatives, and both feel that some injustice has been done to them by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], to whom I have mentioned this matter.

All I wish is to have a paragraph or two read from a letter, so that it will go into the RECORD, to correct what these gentlemen consider a personal injustice to them. If the Senator will allow this to be read, I then merely wish to say a word about it, and will not further encroach upon his time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The paper will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

I see by the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 630, that Senator MORGAN presented to the Senate the tabulated statement obtained from the State Department of the payments out by that Department of moneys received under the Abra award, and prefaced this with the remark, "Now, I will turn to La Abra case, and let us see who got the money for this," and thus sought to make the Senate believe that our firm received as fees all the moneys, or rather, checks, which that tabulated statement shows were delivered to us.

* * * * * * *

The only importance there is in this is not in the fact that it tends to put us in a false position, but is in the fact of this statement, and others like it, being used to persuade the Senate that the lawyers are getting all of this award and the company none. Now, the truth is, so far as said table shows the delivery of checks to us in said matter, that, of all the checks or moneys ever received by us from the State Department, not a dollar of it was received as our own for fees, except $5,000, which is all we have ever been paid for the seven or eight years of most laborious and vexatious service rendered to said company; and, with the exception of said $5,000 received as fees, every dollar which said return from the State Department shows that we received was received by us, or rather one of us, as mere attorney in fact, to be by us handed over, as it all was, to the treasurer of the company and to the attorneys who represented the company before the umpire, Sir Edward Thornton, and we now hold the receipts of the said treasurer and others for said payments to them, amounting to between $70,000 and $80,000.

* * * * * * *

It would be gratifying to us if you could in some way make this statement known to the Senate, in order to counteract the erroneous impressions created by Senator MORGAN'S remarks.

* * * * * * *

SHELLABARGER & WILSON.

Mr. SHERMAN. All I wish to say in addition is that I have participated somewhat in the past in the discussion of these claims, but I do not intend to do so now. My opinion is still, as it was before, that the Weil case seems to be a fraud from beginning to end, and, therefore, any measure of justice that may be done to Mexico I should be willing to vote for.

Mr. BUTLER. We can not hear the Senator.

Mr. SHERMAN. I repeat that so far as the Weil case is concerned I have always stated that that was a clear case of deliberate fraud founded upon perjury, and therefore I would have no hesitation in voting for the refunding of the money in that case.

In regard to the La Abra case I have taken a somewhat different view. I believe it a case of exaggerated damages, but it seems to me the Government of Mexico ought to have taken the pains to have established these facts, which they could have done. With all the power of a government there and being perfectly familiar with the local matters, they should have made their defense before Sir Edward Thornton, and thus avoided this controversy. As they did not do it, I believe it would be better for the public interests and better as an example of international arbitration that the award should stand and be executed in full faith. I have no other feeling on that question. If present at the time when the vote is taken (and I regret to say that I fear I shall not be) I should probably vote against the refunding of the award in the La Abra case for the reason I have given.

All I rose for now was simply to have the statement of these gentlemen spread upon the RECORD, who I know are very reputable lawyers and very able men, that while they receive their fee of $5,000, they did not receive any other money of this award, but it was paid over by them to the proper officers and proper agents of the company. That is all I desire to say.

Mr. MORGAN. I suppose the Senator refers to something I stated in my remarks on this case. I made no reference at all to how much money these gentlemen had received, except so far as was shown in the report that was sent in here by the President of the United States, and that shows distinctly that while they received $5,000 in their own right as a fee, the remainder of what they received was under some power of attorney or assignment.

Mr. SHERMAN. They simply wish it spread upon the RECORD that they did not receive that money themselves, but paid it over to the company or its agents.

Mr. MORGAN. That is all right.

Mr. GEORGE. Now, Mr. President, in order to do justice to the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL], I ask that, as some minutes have been taken up by this interruption, the time for taking the vote by unanimous consent be put at quarter past 3 o'clock, so as to give the Senator from Virginia his full time.

Mr. BUTLER. There is no objection to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi asks unanimous consent that the vote upon this bill be taken at a quarter past 3 o'clock to-day, instead of at 3 o'clock, as heretofore agreed upon.

Mr. FAULKNER. I ask if there has been any time fixed for taking the vote?

Mr. GEORGE. It was fixed for 3 o'clock to-day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there objection to the request of the Senator from Mississippi? The Chair hears none, and it will be so ordered.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, having secured the Senator from Virginia what I regard as his rights in the matter, I proceed in a very short way to present to the Senate the reasons why I consider that the third section of the bill is unconstitutional, and if it were enacted it would be a very serious obstacle in the way of the settlement of this long litigated and contested claim.

The Senate ought to consider some very salient facts connected with this case, so as to know exactly the attitude in which it now stands before this body. In the first place, we ought to discard all idea that the claimants in these cases have any rights to be protected by the judgment and the action of the Senate outside of the rights and the duties of the United States itself. The convention under which this award was made provided that no case should be submitted to the arbitrament of the Joint Commission except cases which were presented by either one of the two Governments.

In the next place, no evidence, no information upon which that Joint Commission were to act was to be presented to them except by the respective Governments.

In the third place, no lawyer, no agent, had a right to appear before that Joint Commission in the advocacy of the claims or in answer to any claim, except an agent appointed by the respective Governments.

So then, Mr. President, as was held by the Supreme Court of the United States in the first case which went before them, each Government became impliedly a guarantor of the good faith and the sincerity not only of a claim, but of the evidence that was introduced in support of a claim. Let the Senate understand that, and let the Senate also understand that this was a litigation before that Joint Commission between the respective Governments of the United States and Mexico, and not between the citizens of the respective Republics asserting their claims. It was a proceeding in which the United States and the Republic of Mexico were parties, and nobody else was a party.

It has been held by the Supreme Court that when a citizen applies to his Government to present his claim against a foreign government, he agrees to submit the management of that case to the discretion of his Government, and when the award is made it is not made in favor of the respective claimants, but in favor of the respective governments, the provision being that the awards on the one side should be added up and those on the other side should be added up, and that the lesser amount should be subtracted from the larger amount and the balance only paid by the government owing the larger amount to the other government.

That was the attitude of the case. There was no provision in the treaty even for a distribution of the award. That was not done until the year 1878. Before that time Mexico had discovered and complained to the United States Government that there had been fraud and perjury submitted to the Joint Commission in the establishment of these claims prior to the year 1878.

In that year Mr. Evarts—and I desire to call the attention of Senators especially to that—reported to the President, and through him to Congress, that the evidence already taken had raised serious doubts as to the justice and validity of these claims; that an investigation ought to be made, and that the executive department of the Government had not sufficient powers to summon and examine witnesses to make a complete examination, and recommended that Congress do that thing and put it upon the ground, as the Supreme Court afterwards did, that the honor of the United States required that we should not be made the instrument of enforcing a fraudulent and unjust claim against our sister Republic.

Then the act of 1878 was passed before any installment of this award had been paid. That act required a distribution of the fund among the several claimants, with the exception of these two cases, and as to them, it required the President to refrain from payment until, on further investigation, he should be satisfied. I desire to read a sentence or two from the act of 1878:

SEC. 5. And whereas the Government of Mexico has called the attention of the Government of the United States to the claims hereinafter named with a view to a rehearing: Therefore, Be it enacted, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to investigate any charges of fraud presented by the Mexican Government as to the cases hereinafter named, and if he shall be of the opinion that the honor of the United States, the principles of public law, or considerations of justice and equity, require that the awards in the cases of Benjamin Weil and La Abra Silver Mining Company, or either of them, should be opened and the cases retried, it shall be lawful for him to withhold payment of said awards, etc.

I read that for the purpose of showing, first, that the Government of Mexico was prompt in making complaint to the United States of the fraudulent character of these claims, and, secondly, for the purpose of showing that Congress, by the act which I have read in the hearing of the Senate, recognized the obligation of the United States to investigate these charges of the Mexican Government and to decide upon the question of restitution or not as "the honor of the United States, the principles of public law, or considerations of justice and equity require."

The Senate ought not to forget that in the very first act which Congress took upon the subject, as well as the action of the executive department, the claim was allowed that Mexico should have r. .ditution of this money if the honor of the United States, or the principles of public law, or considerations of justice required.

After that, Congress having taken no action for some years, Mr. Garfield's Administration paid five installments out of the thirteen, being nearly one-half of the awards to these fraudulent claimants. President Arthur's Administration refused to make any further payment upon a conclusion reached by it that the awards were fraudulent, were obtained by perjury, and that it was in accord with the principles of justice and honor that restitution should be made, and that we should act when we come to make restitution, not upon the strict principles, the technical principles of municipal law, but upon the broad ground stated in the statute, stated in Mr. Evarts's report to the President, and stated in the action of the Arthur Administration, that we should do what was right and proper between nations.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes, sir.

Mr. MCPHERSON. He refers to the act of 1878 passed by Congress. It seems to be obligatory upon the President to investigate the matter. Can the Senator inform me whether any investigation was made by President Garfield or any other President prior to the payment of any one of these awards?

Mr. GEORGE. I do not know, Mr. President. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] can answer that question. I hope I shall not be interrupted any more, for the reason that I want to give some of the hour remaining to the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL].

Mr. MORGAN. Where am I to come in to answer the question?

Mr. GEORGE. You can not come in at all unless you get an extension of time.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the Senator yield to me a moment?

Mr. GEORGE. No; I will not without the consent of the Senator from Virginia. Let the Senator ask him.

Mr. DANIEL. I am willing to yield to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. MORGAN. I do not want two Senators to have the right to farm out the floor. If I can get the floor after the Senator from Mississippi, I shall reply to the question.

Mr. GEORGE. But you can not get the floor now.

Mr. MORGAN. I say if I do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] has the floor.

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator from Virginia yields, I understand, to the Senator from Alabama to go on.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator from Virgina has been acquainted with the case a long time and comes in at the eleventh, twelfth, or thirteenth hour, when a question is put to the Senator from Mississippi, such as we have just heard from the Senator from New Jersey. If he will look at the RECORD he will find that it has been answered twenty-five times.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] to decline to yield.

Mr. MORGAN. As a matter of course, I supposed I should have had a chance to reply and give the information.

Mr. GEORGE. I want the Senator from Alabama to go on, particularly as the Senator from Virginia is willing to yield, and I should like to hear what the Senator has to say.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. DANIEL. Permit me to ask the Senator from Alabama or the Senator from Mississippi if the time may not be extended by his assent? I was not aware that there had been any unanimous consent as to the time for taking the vote.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH] and myself have been here——

Mr. DANIEL. I have not quite finished my remark. The Senator from Alabama will be kind enough to allow me to conclude.

Mr. MORGAN. I beg pardon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the Senator from Mississippi is entitled to the floor.

Mr. GEORGE. I desire that the Senator from Alabama, with the consent of the Senator from Virginia, may be heard.

Mr. DANIEL. I wanted to get through with my remark. I asked the Senator from Alabama if he would not consent that the time might be extended beyond 3 o'clock. I was not aware that that time had been fixed.

Mr. GEORGE. It has been extended to a quarter after 3.

Mr. DANIEL. Unanimous consent being given to the conclusion of the debate at that time. While it is true that I came in at the eleventh hour, I beg to say that about ten and a half of the hours have been consumed by the Senator from Alabama and the Senator from Oregon upon the other side, and there was nowhere else to come in.

Mr. MORGAN. That is very true; but the point I was going to make was that about the time the Senator from Oregon and myself had been trying to explain this very important and very delicate matter to the Senate and to the country we have not, as a rule, had an audience of half a dozen Senators during the whole week of debate, and now that the time for debate by unanimous consent is about to close I think that I should not be cut off from making an answer to the Senator from New Jersey of a question as important as the one he put to me, and which the Senator can inform himself of if he will only look at the record. I believe he is not here now.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I am here.

Mr. MORGAN. I beg pardon.

Mr. GEORGE. What is the answer?

Mr. MORGAN. The answer is this: Mr. Evarts, when Secretary of State, under the act of Congress, took the papers that were submitted by both sides and heard counsel for days and days together. He made his report to the President of the United States that the honor of the United States and the public law and public morality required the Government of the United States to investigate this matter through one of its own tribunals. The evidence he had before him at that time has been reported back here, printed and spread in the reports that come from the different committees of the two Houses during the last ten or twelve years. Frequent allusion has been made to it, and it has always been accessible to everybody. Then the Senate instructed the Committee on Foreign Relations as to the La Abra case to make a still further examination, which has been done, and in a report of five or six hundred pages made by the Senator from Oregon the whole case has been again elaborated. Four Presidents and four Secretaries of State have concurred in the action that has been taken in this matter and have stated in almost every form in which it could be stated that the honor of the United States and justice and public morals required that this case should be examined. That is the situation.

Mr. GEORGE. Now that is settled. I referred that question to the Senator from Alabama because he is more familiar with it than I am. He says that these cases were not only examined by one Administration, by one Secretary of State, by one President, but by four Presidents and by four Secretaries of State, all reaching the same identical conclusion, that these claims were fraudulent.

I remarked some time ago that I was so thoroughly satisfied of the fraudulent character of these claims that if the Committee on Foreign Relations had reported a bill to pay back the money to the Government of Mexico without any further trial I should have been bound to vote for it, because the question involved, as

I shall show, is a political and not a judicial one, and the obligation of the United States to pay back this money rests upon political considerations and not upon the adjudication of courts with reference to municipal law. But as the committee have reported in favor of further investigation, of course I shall vote for the bill if the third section be stricken out.

It is now understood, I suppose, that the duty we owe to Mexico is not one to be determined by the strict technical rules of municipal law, but, in the language of the Supreme Court of the United States—I quote—

> No technical rules of pleading as applied in municipal courts ought ever to be allowed to stand in the way of the national power to do what is right under all the circumstances.

That is the obligation which rests upon this Government, to do that which is right, to do that which the national honor requires to be done, and it is not an obligation to execute a judgment which may be rendered according to the rules of municipal law. I want the Senate to bear in mind that this case is not a case of law, but a case of conscience and right.

Now, Mr. President, that is established, and it is also recognized in the preamble to the bill, which I will read; and I will base upon that the argument that that question can not be submitted to the Supreme Court. I read now from the preamble of the bill:

> Whereas the Secretary of State, after investigating the charge of fraud presented by the Mexican Government as to the case of La Abra Silver Mining Company, has heretofore reported that the "honor of the United States requires" that said case "should be further investigated by the United States to ascertain whether this Government has been made the means of enforcing upon a friendly power claims of our citizens based upon or exaggerated by fraud," but that "the executive Government is not furnished with the means of instituting and pursuing methods of investigation which can coerce the production of evidence or compel the examination of parties and witnesses," and that "the authority for such an investigation must proceed from Congress."

That is the statement of the reason for the passage of the bill. It is to ascertain what the Government of the United States ought to do in honor, in justice, and in equity. That is what the Supreme Court of the United States said we had a right to do, notwithstanding the adverse claims of the parties in whose favor these awards were made. Then we come to the enacting part of the bill, and we find in section 2 the following:

> That full jurisdiction is hereby conferred on the Court of Claims to hear and determine such suit and to make all interlocutory and final decrees therein, as the evidence may warrant, according to the principles of equity and justice, and to enforce the same by injunction.

I take it, therefore, that the meaning of the bill is not to have this case decided according to the technical rules of municipal law, which the Supreme Court of the United States said ought not to govern in a case of this sort, but it is for the purpose of ascertaining what the Government of the United States ought to do in the premises in honor and according to the principles of public law and considerations of equity and good faith, to use the language of the Supreme Court.

That being established, the next question is, can we confer upon the Supreme Court the power to decide what the Government of the United States ought to do in honor, or, as expressed in the bill, according to the principles of equity and justice? That is the precise question before the Senate in the motion to strike out the third section of the bill. Upon that I propose to submit some authority to the Senate, as well as to make a short argument.

In the first place, only judicial power can be conferred upon the Supreme Court of the United States. That is settled by a long series of decisions, commencing with Hepburn's case, in 2 Dallas, and running down to a very great judgment pronounced by Chief Justice Taney in Gordon vs. The United States. Although I am making a very large concession when I make the admission, I admit for the purposes of this argument that a clause in the judgment of Chief Justice Taney in Gordon vs. The United States will warrant us in conferring this jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims, because in that case, whilst the Supreme Court decided that the jurisdiction could not be conferred upon the Supreme Court of the United States, it did concede that it was rightfully conferred upon the Court of Claims.

Only judicial power can be conferred upon the Supreme Court of the United States. What is judicial power? That is the next question. There is no need for controversy or for mistake on that point. If anything has been settled by the adjudications of the Supreme Court of the United States and the supreme courts of the various States in the Union, it is what is judicial power. I read from some cases upon that subject which I collected on a former occasion:

> The kind of authority that is judicial in its nature relates to acts on rights of person and property not created by this authority, but under existing law.

It relates to acts on rights of person and property not created by its authority but under existing law. So, it is the very essence of judicial authority that the right shall not be created by the court itself. The court acts upon acts and circumstances already performed, and ascertains from existing law what rights the parties have growing out of these acts.

In this case we discard the rules of law; we leave to the court the power of its own mind, according to its own conscience, to say for the political department of the Government what is for the honor of the United States, what justice and equity require us to do. These, sir, are all political questions; they are all to be resolved by the political department of the Government. The Government can not call in the Supreme Court, which can only have judicial power, and invest that court with authority to say what this Government ought to do with reference to a foreign nation according to the principles of honor and justice and equity. I will read a little further:

> This authority—
> That is, judicial authority—
> "in specific controversies" between parties, determines these rights as they exist—

Not as the court may create them, but it determines them as they exist—> and does so at the instance of a party. These qualities distinguish judicial power from what is simply executive or legislative. (Spear on Const., page 3.)

The foreign affairs department of this Government is conferred by the Constitution on the Executive. What the United States owes to a foreign government in honor and according to the principles of law and equity are political questions, and must be decided finally by the political department of the Government, the Congress, and the Executive.

Now, Mr. President, have we a right to transfer the high duty of conducting our foreign relations from the executive department of this Government to the judicial department of the Government, a department which, as I have shown, has no power to take into consideration anything in rendering its judgments except the existing law at the time the transaction took place and to apply that law to that transaction? I take it, there can be no serious doubt of that. Whatever may be done by the Court of Claims, it is clear that you can not confer upon the Supreme Court of the United States any power but judicial power, and that power is always to apply existing law to past transactions. The Supreme Court of the United States, in the very case to which I have called attention, decided that the controversy was not to be decided by the rules of municipal law but by considerations of justice and equity.

Mr. President, I do not think it is necessary to go any further than that, except to say that I want restitution made to Mexico. I believe the Government of the United States has been made the instrument (quoting from the Supreme Court) of a great wrong to a sister republic. I believe we ought to make restitution. I believe that so far as Congress is concerned we ought to pass such a law as will effect restitution.

If the third section be unconstitutional, as I am sure it is, what will be the effect of incorporating that section in the bill? It is not always easy to define whether the whole law will fall or only that part which is unconstitutional. If, however, the court finds that part which is unconstitutional is an essential part of the scheme provided for by the law, the court will never undertake to separate that part which is unconstitutional from that part which is constitutional, because, as the courts have declared, they can not say whether Congress would have enacted so much of the law as is constitutional unaccompanied by the unconstitutional part. They can not determine, and so they say if it be an essential part of the scheme fixed by the statute the whole provision must fall.

So, Mr. President, I fear that after the lapse of so many years of laborious investigation, after having found out, as I believe we have found out, that the grossest frauds have been perpetrated upon our sister Republic of Mexico, and then undertaking to make restitution, we do it in a way which will prove futile; the whole scheme will fail, and then at the end of that litigation we are to commence de novo. I am opposed to that.

Nor is it at all necessary with any just scheme to make restitution that the powers of the Supreme Court should be invoked. First, the questions submitted to the Supreme Court are not judicial questions, but political questions. Second, when the facts are ascertained, the political department of the Government, which has jurisdiction of our foreign relations, is entirely competent to decide the important question what is due from the United States as a matter of honor to a foreign government. It is not only competent to do it, but it is the only power within our Government which is competent to do it except the joint action of Congress and the Executive.

There is another danger, Mr. President. It is a rule of the Supreme Court, as it is of every court, when they come to decide whether a law is constitutional or not, that if the language will possibly bear any construction which will make the act constitutional, the court will give the language that meaning. Then we come to decide what justice and equity mean in this statute and we find that there is ambiguity. We find it will be argued to the court, and the court may take that view of it, that equity does not mean that which is merely right and honorable between nations, but that, according to the system of equity jurisprudence as understood in this country, an equitable obligation is created in favor of the Government of Mexico. If they take that view of it, then we have reduced this great question of doing what our honor requires to a sister Republic to the case of a litigation in a court governed by municipal law only.

What will they do when that comes? Suppose we discard considerations of honesty and of honor, and the court in order to maintain jurisdiction and in order to maintain the constitutionality of the third section of this proposed act should hold that the validity of these awards shall be determined solely by municipal law, can any body predict that they can be set aside upon any question of that sort? Sir, it is proven that Mexico, when the case was before the umpire, had in her possession evidence which she said would set aside the award and declined to produce it. In a case of that sort under municipal law, discarding considerations of honor and what is right between nations, there is no municipal court in the world that would not hold that the failure to produce the evidence at the time was a waiver of any ground of complaint against the judgment. There has been a maxim from the very earliest period of common law, and in equity the same maxim prevails, the Latin form of which is, vigilantibus et non dormientibus leges subveniunt—the laws relieve or succor those who are vigilant, not those who sleep upon their rights. There is nothing more common in a court of equity than to turn the complainant out of court upon the ground that he had lost his rights by negligence.

So I say, Mr. President, if we are to decide this case as the Supreme Court of the United States say we ought not to decide it, according to the principles of municipal law, there is danger that in following municipal law we shall fail to do what the Supreme Court of the United States say we ought to do, that which the honor of this Government requires us to do.

For these reasons I shall vote to strike out the third section, and being so confident that the third section is unconstitutional, if it remains in the bill, notwithstanding I desire with all my heart to render justice, to do that which honor and good faith require us to the Republic of Mexico, I shall be compelled to vote against the proposed enactment.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, I have reached a conclusion in this case different from that which has been so ably advocated by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH] and the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN]. In my judgment, in this La Abra claim no sufficient considerations have been deduced before the Senate to justify us in aspersing the decree of an international court—not a domestic tribunal, not a national tribunal in any sense of the word, but an international tribunal, by the decisions of which Mexico is as much bound as the United States, and in which all parties had agreed to submit to a final and conclusive trial.

I do not deny that the Government of the United States has sovereign power to set aside this award in so far as to refuse to execute it. I believe it is a matter that is necessarily an attribute of sovereign power, not controlled, as the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] has said, by positive municipal law, but controlled solely by the enlightened conscience of the nation.

The Senator from Alabama has referred to me as one who long ago was familiar with this case. It was so long ago, Mr. President, that what I knew of it has for the most part been long since forgotten. This La Abra claim is an old customer. It is one of the standing claims upon the docket of Congress, and in every form that Congress can be addressed in its behalf it has heretofore refused to set it aside for considerations satisfactory to itself.

The decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the Boynton case lays down, as I conceived long before it was decided, the just principles which should control this Government, and asserts, as I had had the honor to do in a committee of the House of Representatives of the Forty-ninth Congress, that it is a matter which rests solely within the discretion of Congress.

Mr. President, there are three aspects to this case which address themselves in my mind in no favorable attitude. While it must be conceded that the Government is sovereign and has an undisputed right to do as it pleases about this matter, the power and its exercise are two very different things. We may have the power to do it, and yet it may be inequitable and unjust that we should do it. When we take up the treaty of 1868, under which these claims were adjudicated by an international court, we find in that treaty these words:

> The President of the United States of America and the President of the Mexican Republic hereby solemnly and sincerely engage to consider the decision of the commissioners conjointly, or of the umpire, as the case may be, as absolutely final and conclusive upon each claim decided upon by them or him, respectively, and to give full effect to such decisions without any objection, evasion, or delay whatsoever.

Has that treaty been complied with in so far as the American citizens are concerned who submitted to it? They had a claim against the Government of Mexico. They might have gone to the capital of Mexico and summoned their Mexican witnesses before the Government of Mexico, and there laid their claim upon the ground where the transactions occurred and where the Mexican witnesses were known. By a compact entered into between the United States and Mexico they were anxious to confide their claims into the hands of their own Government, and that Government, not presuming to judge for itself of these rights of its own citizens, entered into a treaty by which an international court was established in which their citizens were represented by but one-third of the power of that tribunal. That tribunal was one-third Mexican; it was one-third English; it was only one-third American; and they themselves were invited to understand that both Governments had agreed that here should be an absolute, final, and conclusive arbitrament of the matter.

Notwithstanding these absolute terms, I can conceive that there are conditions in which this Government of its own motion, from a sense of conscience, might say, "I have determined that I will not permit my citizens to accept the benefit of this award, because facts patent to perception, cogent in conviction, conclusive in logic, have appeared before me by which I discern that an imposition has been practiced upon that court: and it would be a moral theft, so to speak, to permit anyone to accept the fruits of their imposition upon it." But in no case where honest and fair men can see that the case is not a clear one is this Government justified in impugning an award of this dignity under such circumstances rendered. While much has been said by the Senator from Alabama, the Senator from Oregon, and others, which shows that there is grave doubt as to the integrity of this award, yet, although it has been before all the different agencies of this Government that could deal with it for more than a decade of years, it is curious enough that not one of those agencies has yet decided that it was fraudulent, but only that there were matters of grave doubt upon it.

The Senator from Mississippi says that four different Administrations have reached the conclusion that this was a matter of fraud. I beg leave to differ with that honorable gentleman. If they had reached the conclusion and upon their own responsibility had decided that this was a fraud, then why do they want further investigation to ascertain what has already been by them concluded? On the contrary, they have only determined that there are circumstances which in their mind make them suspect the integrity of this award. If it is unjust, and is so apparently so that their consciences are shocked to accept its fruits, why are we invited at the end of now sixteen years to initiate an investigation?

Furthermore, Mr. President, I do not discover from my perusal of this record that either the Secretaries of State or the counsel of the Mexican Government have agreed as to what the issue is which they invite Congress to investigate. I have before me the message of President Cleveland to the Fiftieth Congress of the United States, in which he lays before Congress a communication from Hon. Thomas F. Bayard, the Secretary of State, on this subject. Does the Secretary of State say in this communication to Congress that this was a patent, plain, egregious fraud which calls upon the Government to make restitution? Far from it. I will read a few lines of his communication.

> Since the allegations of fraud in relation thereto—

The La Abra claim he is speaking of—> affects only the measure of damages, and not, as in the Weil case, the question whether any ground of claim ever existed.

On the contrary, so far from this being a fraud cut out of the whole cloth, the Secretary of State of that Administration informs Congress that there is no dispute as to the validity of this claim, but only a question as to the sincerity of the measure of damages. And we are invited now, at the end of sixteen years, to set aside the final and conclusive decree of an international tribunal which all parties had stipulated should be conclusive, when it is admitted by the State Department which sends us the message to have been founded upon a firm foundation, and when, as the Secretary of State himself esteems, it is only a question of the measure of damages which have been awarded by a fair Commission for an acknowledged wrong.

While much criticism has been made, and justly made, for I shall seek—

> Nothing to extenuate,
> Nor set down aught in malice—

concerning many of the witnesses who have appeared in this case—while much just criticism has been pronounced upon many of the witnesses who appeared before the international tribunal, let me say, in the first place, that those criticisms were made there, were made to the umpire, were heard by him on a motion for a new trial, and he, a fair and enlightened publicist, overruled the considerations which were suggested concerning them.

Furthermore, let me say that I do not conceive that the Republic of Mexico stands in this forum with any right of justice, or conscience, or propriety to ask anything at our hands.

In broad terms, this has been the conclusion of all the Secretaries of State. Mr. Evarts said, when he was invited to consider this matter, that so far as Mexico was concerned she had no status to complain.

Now, then, in respect to her conduct, I do not think it is consistent with the proprieties of this international award or with the propriety of asking the United States to set aside this decree upon an appeal to conscience. Notwithstanding the clear, conclusive, absolute terms of the submission, we find that soon after the decree was published to the world the Mexican Government did not act, in my judgment, consistently with its obligation to accept it as a finality. On the 21st of November, 1876, about a year after the decree was entered, the agent of Mexico before the Commission addressed a letter to the Mexican minister at Washington in which he used the following language:

The Mexican Government, in fulfillment of article 5 of the convention of July 4, 1868, considers the result of the proceedings of this Commission as a full, perfect, and final settlement of all claims referred to in said convention, reserving, nevertheless, the right to show, at some future time and before the proper authority of the United States, that the claims of Benjamin Weil, No. 447, and "La Abra Silver Mining Company," No. 489, both on the American docket, are fraudulent and based on affidavits of perjured witnesses; this with a view of appealing to the sentiments of justice and equity of the United States Government, in order that the awards made in favor of claimants should be set aside.

What right, let me ask the Senate, had the Mexican Government, after getting her own claims paid without dispute through the agency of this Commission, after entering into a solemn covenant, as solemn as any which can be made between nations of men, to exercise the power of her representation in the city of Washington to make pleas before our Government to set aside a matter which she had agreed should be absolute, conclusive, and forever ended? Notwithstanding this importunity, the administration of General Grant answered the Mexican Government with a clear perception of the international rights in this case, which were set forth in a communication of Secretary Fish. On the 4th of December, 1876, Secretary Fish, in a letter acknowledging the receipt of the letter from Señor Mariscal which includes that of Señor Vallarta, said:

I must decline, however, to entertain the consideration of any question which may contemplate any violation of or departure from the provisions of the convention as to the final and binding nature of the awards, or to pass upon, or, by silence, to be considered as acquiescing in, any attempt to determine the effect of any particular award.

With your appreciation of the objects in contemplation in this method of settlement of difference between two governments, and with your intimate acquaintance with the particular provisions of this convention as with reference to the binding character of the awards made by the commissioners or by the umpire, you will readily appreciate my extreme unwillingness to consider that at the moment when the proceedings relating to the Commission have been brought to a close, and the obligations upon each Government to consider the result in each case as absolutely final and conclusive becomes perfect, the Government of Mexico has taken or purposes to take any steps which would impair this obligation.

Let him that hath clean hands stand in the court of equity, and let not a sister republic, which had bound herself by the most solemn engagement that men can enter into through the power of that Government, set aside a matter which she had agreed to to be final and of which she herself had accepted so much of the fruits as were apportioned to her without dispute or objection.

Mr. President, this does not seem to have satisfied the Mexican Government. A hint to the wise man may be sufficient. A proper delicacy in dealing with this Government would have compelled Mexico to say to the United States, "We have nothing to ask of you; you have had this decree rendered according to my agreement; I accept it. Here are certain papers which concern you, not me; let your honor and let your conscience act upon them without suggestion of mine." But instead of that the Republic of Mexico plied with its importunities our Department of State, and here we have away in 1877 from Señor Vallarta, chief of the bureau of America of the Mexican department of foreign affairs, addressed to the minister at Washington, a letter from which I read the following extract:

With the intention of making the appeal to the sentiments of justice and equity of the United States Government, announced by the Mexican agent at the close of the proceedings of the Mixed Claims Commission in regard to the claim of Benjamin Weil, No. 447, and to that of La Abra Mining Company, No. 489, both against Mexico, the Government has had printed in two pamphlets some important documents bearing on these claims, and I forward you 400 copies of each one of said pamphlets.

Be pleased to have them distributed among the public officials and other persons to whom, in your opinion, it might be convenient to make known the reasons we have to make the appeal above referred to, as also the true attitude of the Mexican Government in the matter,

The VICE-PRESIDENT (at 3 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.). The Chair will call the attention of the Senator from Virginia to the agreement entered into by unanimous consent that a vote should be taken at this time upon the pending measure.

Mr. VEST. I ask that the Senator from Virginia be permitted to conclude his remarks.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. MORGAN. Agreements of this kind are of no value unless they stand.

Mr. DANIEL. They do not bind persons who are not parties to them, do they?

Mr. MORGAN. No, sir.

Mr. DANIEL. I was not a party to it. I have the floor.

Mr. MORGAN. I do not mean to insist. It has always been the rule of the Senate that any Senator could violate an agreement of the Senate when he chose to do so.

Mr. DANIEL. I withdraw that suggestion, sir. I am informed that there is an understanding among Senators that we shall yield, and I withdraw any objection. If it is not the wish of the Senate, I do not desire to proceed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The pending question——

Mr. DANIEL. But I may be permitted to state, I hope, sir, that I was not aware of this unanimous consent agreement, and if I had supposed that gentlemen on the other side intended to close the debate as soon as they had made their own arguments, I would have been a little more alert to have occupied the attention of the Chair earlier than this.

Mr. MORGAN. I do not wish to cut off the Senator from Virginia from saying anything in the world he wishes to say about this case, but it has been on for a long time. We agreed last Thursday that 3 o'clock to-day should be the time for taking the vote, and to indulge the Senator from Mississippi in his disquisition upon the law fifteen minutes were added this morning by unanimous consent, and the Senator from Virginia was here, I suppose. I shall not be a party to breaking up the arrangement of the Senate. I have never done such a thing as that, and I do not expect ever to do it. We have always, without any sort of dissent, executed the orders of the Senate taken in this way. The Senator from Virginia said he did not know of this agreement. There is a good deal about this matter he does not know. He did not know that Mr. DOLPH'S report was in the committee room this morning. He did not know he had ever made it——

Mr. DANIEL. I decline to yield to the Senator to assail my knowledge of this case. I think I shall show him before I get through, if he does not cut me off, that there are many things about it that he does not know, or which if he does know he has kept very much to himself in the course of his argument.

Mr. MORGAN. If the debate is to go on in this manner let the Senate indulge us, and let us go right through without any further restriction in the world. I shall not be a party in breaking up the arrangement of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chief Clerk will state the pending question, which is the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR].

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out section 3 of the bill in the following words:

SEC. 3. That an appeal from any final decision in such cause to the Supreme Court of the United States may be taken by either party within ninety days from the rendition of such final decree, under the rules of practice which govern appeals from said court, and the Supreme Court of the United States is hereby authorized to take jurisdiction thereof and decide the same.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. VEST. What is that amendment? Let us hear it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be again read.

The Chief Clerk again read the section proposed to be stricken out.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. PLATT. I should like to inquire whether the amendments which were suggested the other day by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS] have been acted on or accepted by the committee? There was some talk to the effect that those amendments would be accepted.

Mr. MORGAN. They have not been acted upon. The members of the committee who have been conferred with about them are willing to accept the amendments of the Senator from Wisconsin, considering that they materially improve the perspicacity of the language of the bill.

Mr. CHANDLER. The last amendment moved by the Senator from Wisconsin is to section 5 instead of section 3, as printed.

Mr. PALMER. I did not hear distinctly the remark of the Senator from Alabama as to the amendments of the Senator from Wisconsin.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands the Senator from Alabama to state that the committee accept the amendments presented by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. PALMER. I did not understand whether the amendments were accepted or not.

Mr. MORGAN. The Chair will allow me to state that the committee have not accepted the amendments. I said that those members of the committee with whom I have had an opportunity to confer are of opinion that the language employed by the Senator from Wisconsin improves the clearness of the bill.

Mr. DOLPH. Let the amendments be read, and then the sense of the Senate can be taken on them in their order. Perhaps the Senator from Wisconsin does not understand that it is necessary to move the amendments; that they can not be brought before the Senate without a motion.

Mr. VILAS. I was about to address the Chair for that purpose. If it be in order, I will move the amendments as they have been printed, calling attention to a correction which is necessary to be made to the second amendment, at the foot of the first page of amendments as printed, by striking out lines 10 and 11, so that the second amendment will read:

And, in case it be so determined, to bar and foreclose all claim in law or equity on the part of said La Abra Silver Mining Company, its legal representatives or assigns, to the money, or any such part thereof, received from the Republic of Mexico for or on account of such award.

The fourth amendment I will move as printed, except to strike out the words, in line 21, "as was made upon the claim of said company." Those words I omit upon the suggestion of the Senator from Oregon. I understand that the amendments have received the approbation of those members of the committee who have been consulted in respect to them.

Mr. DOLPH. Let the amendments be stated in their order.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, let the amendments be reported and considered in their order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendments will be read and considered in their order. The first amendment moved by the Senator from Wisconsin will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 1, line 13, it is proposed to strike out the word "or," where it occurs between the words "fraud" and "false," and insert in lieu thereof the words "effectuated by means of," so as to read:

And all persons making any claim to the award or any part thereof in this act mentioned, to determine whether the award made by the United States and Mexican Mixed Commission in respect to the claim of the said La Abra Silver Mining Company was obtained, as to the whole sum included therein or as to any part thereof, by fraud effectuated by means of false swearing or other false and fraudulent practices, etc.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The next amendment in order will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed, in section 1, line 15, after the word "assigns," to insert the following:

And, in case it be so determined, to bar and foreclose all claim in law or equity on the part of said La Abra Silver Mining Company, its legal representatives or assigns, to the money, or any such part thereof, received from the Republic of Mexico for or on account of such award.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The next amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 4, line 4, it is proposed to strike out the words "based upon or," and also in the same line strike out the word "or," where it occurs between the words "fraud" and "false," and insert in lieu thereof the words "effectuated by means of;" so as to read:

That in case it shall be finally adjudged in said cause that the award made by said Mixed Commission, so far as it relates to the claim of La Abra Silver Mining Company, was obtained through fraud effectuated by means of false swearing or other false and fraudulent practices of said company or its assigns, or by their procurement, the President of the United States is hereby authorized to release the Government of Mexico, etc.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President——

Mr. MORGAN. Before the Senator from Texas proceeds, I desire to move to strike out the words following the word "to," in line 7 of section 4, on page 4, being the words "release the Government of Mexico from the further payment thereof, to the extent that the same is so declared fraudulent, and to;" so as to read:

The President of the United States is hereby authorized to return to said Government any money paid by the Government of Mexico on account of said award, etc.

Mr. PLATT. It has all been paid?

Mr. MORGAN. It has all been paid up. I move that as an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. CHILTON. By consent of the Senator from Alabama, who has charge of the bill, in view of the action which has been taken upon the motion to strike out the clause providing for an appeal, and in order to cover any contingency which might arise if all the sections of this proposed law were held to be interdependent, I propose an amendment to the amendment which has been made. In section 5, line 25, after the words "and in case it shall be finally adjudged in said cause," I move to insert:

Either in the Court of Claims or in the Supreme Court of the United States.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will call the attention of the Senator from Texas to the fact that the amendment proposed to section 4 has not yet been acted upon, and that is first in order.

Mr. GEORGE. I should like to inquire if the vote has been taken upon the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts to strike out the third section?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It has been taken.

Mr. GEORGE. The third section has been stricken out?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment was not agreed to. The pending question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas is now in order.

Mr. CHILTON. I move after the words "shall be finally adjudged in said cause" to insert "either in the Court of Claims or in the Supreme Court of the United States."

Mr. DOLPH. I should like to suggest to the Senator from Texas that that would be a little equivocal. Suppose it should be adjudged in the Court of Claims that the award was fraudulent and on appeal to the Supreme Court it was reversed, then the Secretary of State would undertake to return the money in the face of a judgment of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. CHILTON. It is to be finally adjudged, the Senator will understand. The words I propose to insert are used in connection with the preceding language.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment submitted by the Senator from Wisconsin to the fourth section is first in order, and will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 4, line 6, after the word "procurement," it is proposed to insert the words:

And that the said La Abra Silver Mining Company, its legal representatives or assigns, be barred and foreclosed of all claim to the money or any part thereof so paid by the Republic of Mexico for or on account of such award.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin to the fourth section of the bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOLPH. Now let the amendment of the Senator from Texas be stated.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment of the Senator from Texas is in order as an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin to the fifth section of the bill. The amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 5 it is proposed to strike out from and including the words "and in case said court" to the end of the section, and insert in lieu thereof the words:

And in case it shall be finally adjudged in said cause that the award made by said Mixed Commission, so far as it relates to the claim of La Abra Silver Mining Company, or any definable and severable part thereof, was not obtained through fraud as aforesaid, then the Secretary of State shall proceed to distribute so much of the said award as shall be found not so obtained through fraud, or the proceeds thereof remaining for distribution, if any, to the persons entitled thereto.

Mr. CHILTON. I move to amend the amendment by inserting after the words "finally adjudged in said cause," in line 25, the words:

Either in the Court of Claims or in the Supreme Court of the United States.

So as to read:

And in case it shall be finally adjudged in said cause, either in the Court of Claims or in the Supreme Court of the United States, that the award made by said Mixed Commission, so far as it relates to the claim of La Abra Silver Mining Company, or any definable and severable part thereof, was not obtained through fraud as aforesaid, then the Secretary of State shall proceed to distribute so much of the said award as shall be found not so obtained through fraud, or the proceeds thereof remaining for distribution, if any, to the persons entitled thereto.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there are no further amendments as in Committee of the Whole the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. VANCE. Let us have the yeas and nays upon the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FAULKNER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY]. I do not know how he would vote, but if he were present I should vote "nay."

Mr. DAWES (when Mr. HOAR'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. HOAR] is detained from the Senate by sickness, and is paired with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH], who is also detained by sickness. I do not know how either of them would vote.

Mr. MORGAN. My colleague [Mr. PUGH] is paired with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL], but the Senator from Virginia voted "yea," as my colleague would have voted, and therefore the pair stands with the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. DAWES. My colleague did not intimate how he would vote; but he is detained on account of sickness.

Mr. KENNA (when his name was called). I am paired on all questions with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT].

Mr. MITCHELL (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. HILL]. I suppose this is not a political question, and I should be glad to vote.

Mr. FAULKNER and others [to Mr. MITCHELL]. You can vote.

Mr. MITCHELL. I vote "yea."

Mr. TURPIE (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS], who is absent, and therefore I withhold my vote.

Mr. WALTHALL (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN]. If he were here I should vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CULLOM. I have a general pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY]. I therefore withhold my vote. I should vote "yea" if he were present,

Mr. BUTLER. I am paired with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES]. If he were present I should vote "yea," and I understand he would vote "nay."

Mr. ALLISON (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a pair usually with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL]. I do not see him in his seat, and therefore, having voted in the affirmative, I will withdraw my vote.

Mr. FRYE. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN]; but I feel at liberty in this case to vote, and I vote "yea."

Mr. ALLEN (after having voted in the affirmative). I should have announced, before voting, that I have a pair with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BATE], who was necessarily called from the Chamber. Before going out, however, he gave me the privilege of voting if I saw fit.

Mr. MANDERSON. I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN]. If he were present I should vote "yea."

Mr. PLATT. I have a pair with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. BARBOUR]. If he were present I should vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 43, nays 5; as follows:

YEAS—43.

Allen,	Dawes,	Irby,	Peffer,
Berry,	Dixon,	Jones, Ark.	Proctor,
Call,	Dolph,	Kyle,	Ransom,

Carlisle,	Hansbrough,	Quay,	Warren,
Cockrell,	Hill,	Sanders,	Wolcott.

So the bill was passed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the preamble.

The preamble was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. By unanimous consent Senate bill 606 was agreed to be taken up upon the conclusion of the bill just passed.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 606) to amend and enlarge the act approved June 18, 1878, entitled "An act to provide for the distribution of the awards under the convention between the United States of America and the Republic of Mexico," concluded on the 4th day of July, 1868.

Mr. MORGAN. I have some amendments to offer to the bill. In line 12, of section 1, I move to strike out the word "or," where it occurs the second time in that line, between the words "fraud" and "false," and to insert "effectuated by means of;" so as to read:

Or as to any part thereof, by fraud effectuated by means of false swearing, or other false and fraudulent practices.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORGAN. In line 14 of the same section, I move to insert after the word "assigns"——

Mr. VILAS. If the Senator from Alabama will permit me, I will state that those amendments to the bill have been already printed.

Mr. MORGAN. I have them in print here. I move to insert after the word "assigns" the following:

And, in case it be so determined, to bar and foreclose all claim in law or equity on the part of said Weil, his legal representatives or assigns, to the money, or any such part thereof, received from the Republic of Mexico for or on account of such award as was made by said Mexican Mixed Commission upon the said claim.

Mr. VILAS. I call the attention of the Senator from Alabama to the fact that those last words, "was made by said Mexican Mixed Commission upon the said claim," were omitted from the provisions of the other bill as being perhaps somewhat misdescriptive.

Mr. MORGAN. I will modify the amendment by striking out the words indicated by the Senator from Wisconsin.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Alabama, as modified.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORGAN. In section 4, lines 3 and 4, I move to strike out the words "based upon or obtained through," and after the word "fraud," in line 4, to strike out the word "or" and insert "effectuated by means of;" so as to read:

That in case it shall be finally adjudged in said cause that the award made by said Mixed Commission, so far as it relates to the claim of Benjamin Weil, was effectuated by means of fraud, false swearing, or other false and fraudulent practices of said Benjamin Weil, or his assigns, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORGAN. In section 4, line 6, after the word "procurement," I move to insert:

And that the said Weil, his legal representatives or assigns, be barred and foreclosed of all claim to the money or any part thereof so paid by the Republic of Mexico for or on account of such award as was made upon the claim of said Weil.

Mr. VILAS. I again call the attention of the Senator from Alabama to the fact that in the La Abra bill the similar amendment stopped at the words "such awards," and that the subsequent words were omitted.

Mr. MORGAN. I remember that now, and I will modify my amendment according to the suggestion of the Senator from Wisconsin.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will stated as modified.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 4, line 6, after the word "procurement," it is proposed to insert:

And that the said Weil, his legal representatives or assigns, be barred and foreclosed of all claim to the money or any part thereof so paid by the Republic of Mexico for or on account of such award.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORGAN. In section 4, line 7, after the word "to," I move to strike out the words "release the Government of Mexico from the further payment thereof to the extent that the same is so declared fraudulent, and to;" so as to read:

The President of the United States is hereby authorized to return to said Government any money paid by the Government of Mexico on account of said award remaining in the custody of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORGAN. I will ask the Senator from Wisconsin and the Senator from Texas if they will offer the amendment to the first part of section 4 in the form in which it was adopted on the preceding bill.

Mr. CHILTON. In section 4, line 2, after the word "cause," the first word in the line, I move to insert:

Either in the Court of Claims or in the Supreme Court of the United States.

So as to read:

That in case that it shall be finally adjudged in said cause, either in the Court of Claims or in the Supreme Court of the United States, that the award made by said Mixed Commission, so far as it relates to the claim of Benjamin Weil, etc.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment moved by the Senator from Texas.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHILTON. The same clause should be inserted in the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin, I understand.

Mr. MORGAN. I suggest to the Senator from Texas that that is hardly necessary, after having expressed it once in the section.

Mr. CHILTON. I presume not, only the other clause refers to the negative, that the decree was not obtained by fraud.

Mr. MORGAN. If I can have the ear of the Senator from Wisconsin a moment, I will ask him, as I do not think I have a correct memorandum of the amendment he proposed to section 5, if he will be good enough to present it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that the Clerks have the amendment at the desk. It will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 5, line 5, it is proposed to strike out from and including the words "and in case said court" to the end of the section, and to insert in lieu thereof the words:

And in case it shall be finally adjudged in said cause that the award made by said Mixed Commission, so far as it relates to the claim of Benjamin Weil, or any definable or severable part thereof, was not obtained through fraud, as aforesaid, then the Secretary of State shall proceed to distribute so much of the said award as shall be found not so obtained through fraud, or the proceeds thereof remaining for distribution, if any, to the persons entitled thereto.

Mr. VILAS. I call the attention of the clerks to the fact that in the printed amendments that is printed section 3 instead of section 5. It should be section 5. I suggest also to the Senator from Alabama that in moving this amendment he now incorporate with it the words adopted in the La Abra bill on the motion of the Senator from Texas, so as to read "in case it shall be finally adjudged in said cause, either in the Court of Claims or, upon appeal, by the Supreme Court."

Mr. MORGAN. I will offer the amendment in that form. I move to amend section 5 by inserting, after the word "cause," the words "either in the Court of Claims or in the Supreme Court of the United States."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated as modified.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 5, line 5, after the word "assigns," strike out all down to and including the word "thereto," in line 10, being the remainder of the section, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

And in case it shall be finally adjudged in said cause, either in the Court of Claims or in the Supreme Court of the United States that the award made by said Mixed Commission, so far as it relates to the claim of Benjamin Weil, or any definable and severable part thereof, was not obtained through fraud, as aforesaid, then the Secretary of State shall proceed to distribute so much of the said award as shall be found not so obtained through fraud, or the proceeds thereof remaining of distribution, if any, to the persons entitled thereto.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

PRINTING AND DISTRIBUTION OF PUBLIC DOCUMENTS.

Mr. MANDERSON. I ask that the special order be laid before the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the special order, which is Senate bill 1549.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. 1549) providing for the public printing and binding and the distribution of public documents.

Mr. DANIEL. Is that the special order which now comes before the Senate?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is the special order.

Mr. MANDERSON. I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the bill at length he dispensed with, and that the bill be read by sections for amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read by sections for amendment, if there be no objection.

Mr. DANIEL. Before that matter comes up, I should like to move to reconsider the vote by which the La Abra bill was passed, and to submit a few remarks in reference thereto.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The printing bill will remain as the unfinished business.

MEXICAN COMMISSION AWARDS.

Mr. DANIEL. I move that the vote by which Senate bill 539, known as the La Abra bill, was passed be reconsidered.

Mr. President, when I was cut off by the Senator from Alabama from the remarks which I was making respecting this bill, I was referring to the peculiar and, to my mind, the very improper attitude which the Mexican Government occupied in regard to this arbitration. I had read from a communication which was sent to the Mexican minister to the United States, by which its protest against the decree was requested to be printed and 400 copies circulated broadcast among the officials of this Government in order to disquiet their minds as to the integrity of that award, and to create a public sentiment in favor of the State of Mexico whose lips, by her convention, had been silenced.

This importunity of the Mexican Government extended from 1876 to 1877 and for a series of years, and meantime it became the subject of investigation in Congress in 1878, when Hon. Henry Wilson of Massachusetts was a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations, and that committee was composed of a body of publicists who had as enlightened views about the responsibilities of international law as almost any committee that has ever held that position in the Senate. Mr. Sumner, I believe, was the chairman of that committee. In a report which they made to the Senate they declined to intervene on the part of the United States Government, and in the course of their remarks, after summing up the considerations for that conclusion, they said:

Viewing the subject in the light of the foregoing, the committee are of the opinion that Mexico is entitled to no relief at the hands of Congress.

Again they say:

It is the opinion of the committee that the question presented, in so far as it relates to payment of money under the awards received from Mexico, is entirely within the jurisdiction and discretion of the treaty-making power under the Constitution, and that the Executive is, with the concurrence of the Senate, fully empowered to open negotiations with Mexico by further treaty, if the two powers can concur therein, to accomplish the relief asked for; and if, in the opinion of the President, such frauds have been practiced as to entitle Mexico to relief, this committee would be gratified to know that proper steps would be taken to that end.

There was a propriety and a wisdom in this judgment which it seems to me commends itself to us. If there were a further convention with Mexico with a view to rectifying an apparent wrong which had grown out of one, Mexico might be placed upon conditions to rehear cases which had been decided against our own citizens, and we would not appear before the world in the attitude of attacking our own citizens in our own courts with no corresponding rights for them should they see fit to have a corresponding advantage.

Being denied by the Secretary of State and being denied at the bar of the Senate in 1878, we find again in 1880 that a bill very much of the nature of the bill which is now before the Senate appeared here, when Allen G. Thurman was chairman of the Committee of the Judiciary of the Senate, when Roscoe Conkling and Joseph E. McDonald and Matt Carpenter were members thereof.

I may, indeed, be erroneous in my own conclusions, but surely I need make no apology when I find them vindicated by the opinions of men of as high character as those who occupied positions both upon the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate and who were members later of its Judicial Committee. This committee came to a conclusion very much in the line of the remarks which have been made to-day by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE], that it was a matter for the political department of this Government to act upon; and if that department had been under any such conviction of conscience as animates many to-day upon this floor, have they not had full powers, when witnesses were alive and when facts were fresh, to have investigated them years and years ago when an investigation might be hoped to lead to the very truth of the matter?

Mr. President, twelve years ago in this very body a bill of the nature of that which is before us to-day was reported against and defeated. Twice after that treaties offered here for the purpose of entering into a new convention with Mexico were defeated. In the meantime the tardy process of law has held up much of this fund in the office of the Secretary of State. The main persons who figured in this transaction have gone to—

The undiscovered country, from whose bourn
No traveler returns, and we are asked to-day, at the instance and at the importunity of a government who in equity and conscience have no right to open their lips, to turn over the characters of our own people to the tender mercies of interested witnesses against whom they are powerless.

Mr. President, there is another aspect in which it appears to me that the Government of Mexico does not stand in any high attitude before this tribunal. In the year 1876, and under the Administration of that period, the Government of the United States was represented at the court of Mexico by Hon. John W. Foster, a diplomatist who is well known. That gentleman is, as I have heard, to-day occupying relations with the State Department of the United States in some way connected with its reciprocity treaties and conventions with other nations. Does it seem to be an appropriate and a becoming thing that one who had been our minister at the court of the foreign government between whom and us this convention exists, and who, if I am not to-day misinformed, has access to the State Department of our own country, should appear here in the Senate Chamber or at the doors of our committee as the paid attorney of Mexico to belittle and to drag down the claims of our own citizens, when he has occupied this varied public relation to the two Governments between whom this matter depends?

Mr. President, I hold in my hand a document known as the Foreign Relations of the United States of the year 1878. In that document I find a letter from Hon. John W. Foster, addressed from the legation of the United States in the City of Mexico on October 9, 1878, in which he draws a picture of the condition of affairs in that country and of the outrageous treatment which American citizens had received at the hands of governmental authorities and of its people, which I am sure would disincline anyone to relax a judgment which had been entered in favor of anyone of our own citizens when suing in a fair court for redress and restitution. I beg leave to put before the Senate a picture of Mexico as drawn by her own counsellor here, by her own counsellor in a cause in which she had plighted her sacred faith, to say no more.

The Hon. John W. Foster wrote this letter, addressing it to Mr. Mason, of Chicago, in answer to an invitation to visit that city and to give any views that he might have gained through his residence in the City of Mexico on the subject of American visitation and investment in that country. The letter is a long one. The minister of the United States evidently wrote it when he had a keen sense of the wrongs which American citizens had suffered at the hands of that people.

American capitalists—

Said he—can not lose sight of the half century of disorder and revolution in Mexico, and there is a general conviction among them that they can not safely invest their money in a large railroad enterprise in this country, unless the protection of the Government of the United States, by some treaty stipulation or other convention, goes with it.

* * * * * * *

At the last session of Congress, Senator MORGAN of Alabama, with the most friendly disposition toward Mexico, offered a series of resolutions in regard to our political and commercial relations. Accepting the prevailing view entertained by American capitalists mentioned above, one of the Senator's resolutions was that "It is expedient to provide by treaty for the protection and encouragement of such citizens of either country as shall, with the consent of the Government of Mexico, build and equip a line of railroad from the City of Mexico to the Rio Grande," etc.

This resolution—

A friendly invitation of the people of the United States to our adjoining Republic—

This resolution—

Says the diplomatic counselor for Mexico before the Senate—

being published here was denounced as a proposition to establish an American protectorate over Mexico, with the ultimate aim of its annexation.

Then Mr. President, this gentleman proceeds to draw a picture of affairs in Mexico—

The distinguished gentleman—

Señor Zamacona he refers to—

The distinguished gentleman who made the address of welcome to Señor Zamacona at his reception in your city scouted the charge of the insecurity of life and property in this country as a "slander," and styled the authors as "malicious detractors." I will not deny his assertion that life is as safe in the City of Mexico as in Chicago, for there is a good police system in this city, and the order and quiet of its streets will compare favorably with that of other civilized cities of the world.

But the manufacturer and merchant of Chicago hope, in following the suggestions made at said reception, to have not only this city but the whole republic as a field of commercial enterprise. At the risk of subjecting myself to the serious charge referred above, I feel it my duty to cite some facts which have come under my notice and which are well known in this country.

Not a single passenger train leaves this city or Vera Cruz, the termini of the only completed railroad in the country, without being escorted by a company of soldiers to protect it from assault and robbery. The manufacturers of this city who own factories in the valley within sight of it, in sending out money to pay the weekly wages of the operatives, always accompany it with an armed guard; and it has repeatedly occurred during the past twelve months that the street railway cars from this city to the suburban villages have been seized by bands of robbers and the money of the manufacturers stolen. Every mining company which sends its metal to this city to be coined or shipped abroad always accompanies it by a strong guard of picked men; and the planters or others who send money or valuables out of the city do likewise.

But if these things occur within sight of the capital, it is natural to suppose that they are more frequent in distant parts of the Republic.

He then goes on to cite an outrage upon a Belgian citizen and then to speak of outrages to American citizens. He calls attention to his communication, which President Grant caused to be published, in which this language is used:

During the short time that I have been in charge of this legation, I have been officially informed by the consuls of my Government, residing in the different localities of the Republic of Mexico, of the death of thirteen American citizens by violence and outrage, some of them murders of the most brutal character and revolting to our common civilization. In addition to these, I have also received official intelligence of several brutal assaults and personal outrages upon American citizens, not resulting in loss of life.

* * * * * * *

Murder and personal outrage are bad enough, but, while it may appear strange, it is nevertheless true that capital and property are more sensitive to protection than life itself.

* * * * * * *

I give the experience of one American banker and mining capitalist in Chihuahua during the recent revolution as a sample of the rest. The Diaz partisans captured the city of Chihuahua and held it for a few weeks in the fall of 1876. Their first act was to levy a forced loan, and $3,500 was apportioned to the American banker as his share. He was at the time absent from the city on his hacienda (plantation). An armed guard was sent to collect it. As he had already paid considerable sums for the same purpose he thought that he had contributed his full share, and therefore he declined to pay. The guard made him a prisoner, and started with him to the city; but meanwhile the Lerdo forces had recaptured the place, and he was instead carried off to the mountains, and notice was sent to his family that $50,000 would be required for his ransom. He refused to advise his family to pay so dearly for his release, so he was carried around with this roving band of revolutionists, from one mountain fastness to another, as they were driven about by the government troops, compelled to sleep on the bare ground in the cold mountain air, several times exposed to the fire of the enemy, and in imminent peril of his life, until, after thirty days of hardships, he was finally released upon the payment of the original sum demanded, $3,500.

The whole paper, Mr. President, contains an elaborate picture of the condition of affairs in Mexico in which American citizens were outraged, murdered, subjected to forced loans, and otherwise ill-treated. The minister who draws this picture, which is too long for me to paint either by quotation or by description, goes on to state that that condition of affairs had existed in Mexico for fifty years; and now, when one of our own citizens under a fair international tribunal has been awarded damages against the Mexican nation, which has solemnly pledged itself to abide by the award, he appears as counsel for that Government to tell us that the damages were too great and that he was constrained to initiate proceedings to diminish or to abolish them.

Furthermore, Mr. President, there is another circumstance in this case which has been adverted to more than once, but which I desire to put before the Senate in an aspect which strikes my mind as cogent and convincing.

In the course of the proceedings taken before the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, when this subject was being investigated, the counsel for this claimant was examining a witness, and in the course of his examination—it was Gen. Slaughter, of Mobile, Ala.—he asked this question:

Now, did you have any written agreement with Green as to what he was to do?

Green was a subagent of Gen. Slaughter.

Mr. FOSTER. I object. I think we have got to a point where we must object. We consent very cheerfully to their developing the arrangement made between the Mexican Government and Gen. Slaughter, but I think, in view of the attitude which these claimants have assumed before this committee, that we must object to their going into a detailed examination of what arrangement Gen. Slaughter has made with other persons on his own account in the execution of this contract.

What was the contract? I ask that that contract may be spread in full in this RECORD. It is an agreement entered into in 1877.

Mr. MORGAN. That is already in the record.

Mr. DANIEL. I want it put it with my remarks.

Mr. MORGAN. The committee put it in the record.

Mr. DANIEL. I know it is in the record in the case, but I want it in the RECORD of Congress.

It is an agreement entered into in 1877 between James E. Slaughter, of Alabama, and Ignacio Mariscal, the Mexican minister at Washington. It is not an engagement of professional services for the purpose of enlightening the conscience of this nation by argument. The nature of the engagement and the method of compensation for it will appear from its text. It provides:

This agreement made this 29th day of March, A. D. 1877, by and between Gen. James E. Slaughter, of Mobile, Ala., party of the first part, and Señor Don Ignacio Mariscal, minister of Mexico to the United States, party of the second part:

Witnesseth, that the said party of the first part agrees, for the considerations hereinafter named, to undertake the proof of fraud in the claim of the La Abra Mining Company against the Government of Mexico, which claim is numbered 489 on the docket of the Joint Commission of the United States and Mexico, and has been adjudicated by the umpire of said Commission.

To this end the said party of the first part agrees to send an agent to Mexico for the purpose of securing testimony in proof of the fraudulent character of said claim; to pay the expenses of such agent as far as the City of Mexico, and to secure such assistance as may be necessary in preparing the evidence so obtained, and presenting the same to the proper authorities of the Government of the United States.

The said party of the second part, acting for and in behalf of the Government of Mexico, hereby agrees to secure the payment by said Government of all expenses incurred by the said agent of the party of the first part after he shall have arrived in the City of Mexico; to see that all facilities are furnished by said Government to enable him to secure the necessary testimony, and to pay, by draft payable as hereinafter specified, one-half of the expense incurred by the said party of the first part in the preparation of evidence and the presentation of the same to the proper authorities of the Government of the United States; provided, that such expenses shall not exceed the sum of $3,000 American currency.

And the said party of the second part further agrees, in consideration of the services above named, to pay to the said party of the first part, by drafts upon the national treasury of Mexico, payable in Mexican gold ten months after presentation at said treasury, a sum equal to 10 per cent of any portion of said claim which may be waived or finally withdrawn by the proper authorities of the Government of the United States, or of its total amount if it be waived or withdrawn in the same manner; said drafts to be drawn by the minister of Mexico at Washington immediately upon the final waiver or withdrawal of said claim or any portion thereof, as the case may be, by said authorities of the United States Government.

In witness whereof we have hereunto set our respective hands and seals seals this 29th day of March, A. D. 1877.

JAMES E. SLAUGHTER.
IGNACIO MARISCAL.

Mr. President, if this is the manner in which international arbitration is going to be conducted hereafter by the Government of the United States, it will stink in the nostrils of mankind. Talk to me about the conscience of this country being smitten to make restitution to a government which dares to stand in the vestibule of the Senate, having broken its plighted faith and hired our own citizens and given them contingent fees out of funds which have been dedicated to our payment! There is not a respectable chancellor of the English-speaking race in Christendom who, if such a contract as that was to appear at the bar of his court, would not throw out any case that came there with it.

I can not understand how gentlemen can appeal to my conscience to do the right thing under a solemn engagement of honor when at the very moment the party who entered into the engagement with me has spat contemptuously upon my sense of honor and has hired my own people and given them part and lot of the fruits of proving fraud upon one of our citizens.

That contract is not a good contract in common law. Can any man hire himself out to another to go about through the world to prove that another is a fraud and to furnish the testimony thereof? Is the stake of honor which has been confided to the stakeholder a fit subject to be parted in contingent fees and another party interested to get possession of it, when it belongs in equity and conscience to the parties who sued for it and claimed it?

Mr. President, there are two questions involved in this case: The one is the honor of the United States, the other is the rights of our citizens. Our citizens may occupy such a relation to this matter that it would be improper to withhold from them or from their assignees this award fairly earned; and yet it might be becoming in the United States, noblesse oblige, to take out of our own pocket the money, to hand it back to our sister Republic of Mexico as an indication of that high and lofty spirit which will disdain to receive fruits which are shadowed with suspicion. But you can not address yourself to the honor of a nation and to the cupidity of its people at the same time. You can not ask an apology at the mouth of a cannon or with the clink of a dollar. If the restitution comes, it must be our act, unmoved by the importunity of one whose lips are silenced, unprovoked and uninfluenced by the gold which has been put up as the stake and pledge of honor.

We are looking to the period in the development of civilization when international arbitration shall take the place of the sword. In order that it may take the place of the sword it must be as final in its decrees as a decree of the sword. More than that, it must not be subjected to the paltry considerations of contingent fees and of local counsel and of lobbyists around the Congress of the United States, such as might exist in a small two-penny claim before a committee or in a case before a justice of the peace.

If, in my judgment, after reading the documents in this case, that money were all paid over and the Republic of Mexico had simply laid the facts before this Government, folded its arms, shut its lips, and gone its way confiding in our integrity—if, in my judgment, one dollar of that fund had been procured from her by improper influences, there is nothing that would afford me more pleasure and more satisfaction than to do my part toward putting the hand of Congress into the Treasury of the United States and saying, "We disdain to receive a dollar that is under the shadow of suspicion."

But, Mr. President, this case is attended with more suspicion than the arbitrament itself. Can we in justice to our citizen, when he has submitted to an international arbitration, permit his money to be pledged to those who have got a contract to prove him a fraud and who do not get compensation unless they can demonstrate a crime? Are these agencies of justice, or are they agencies of cupidity and of falsehood and of wrong? So much, then, for the attitude of Mexico.

Now, this case, in my judgment, differs toto cœlo from the case of Weil, which succeeds it. There I think is a plain, palpable, open, unquestioned fraud. I have not yet seen the first man who read the record in that case who did not, upon seeing the disclosures and exposures there, shrink back from it as a thing which to the naked eye of conscience was a palpable wrong out of the whole cloth. I shall vote to set it aside, and when the proper time shall come I would restore to Mexico every dollar of it, whether we recover it or no. It would be dishonest; it would be shameful; it would be inconsistent with the character of an honest nation either to receive or, having received, to keep a dollar so obtained.

But, Mr. President, this is a totally different case. The Secretary of State under the administration of Mr. Cleveland informed Congress that the only question in this case was the amount of damages. The Hon. William M. Evarts, Secretary of State of an anterior administration, came to the same conclusion. We have, then, the gravamen of the offense against our citizen acknowledged, proved, demonstrated, confessed. I find in the award and in the facts the rationale of the award made by Sir Edward Thornton its own best intrinsic vindication.

Much has been said in debate as to the circumstances attending the Weil case. The minutiæ of testimony in the La Abra case have also been much commented upon and displayed at great length in the record and have engaged much of the attention of the Senate. When you come to analyze that case you will discover, however, this most important and controlling fact: that the arbitrator in delivering his judgment did not cover those controverted points by his decision. In other words, although you might admit, for the sake of the argument, that the authorities of Mexico and the revolutionists did not capture any of the mule trains of the La Abra Company; although you may admit that it is not true, as was originally asserted, that there was a forced loan levied upon the La Abra Company; although you may admit that there was no seizure by the troops of $1,200 from one of its employés; although you may admit that Grove, who was murdered, was not murdered by any agency for which Mexico might be held responsible; although you may admit that the imprisonment of Exall was exaggerated or did not exist, and though you may admit that none of the ores were carried off, as alleged, nevertheless, under the judgment of Sir Edward Thornton, none of these circumstances which have been so much relied upon were considered, but it was based on grounds which are independent and separate from them.

Here, Mr. President, is the judgment, and by reading what Sir Edward Thornton says one will see at once the comprehensive light in which he regarded this case and the equitable principles upon which he ascertained the damages.

There is no doubt—

He said—that the Mexican Government was very desirous of attracting foreigners to the Republic, and of inducing them to bring their capital into it and raising up industrial establishments of all kinds. With this view it issued proclamations encouraging the immigration of foreigners and promising them certain advantages and full protection. It can not be denied that the claimants were justified in placing confidence in these promises.

This La Abra Mining Company did not consist of irresponsible adventurers. One of its directors and its president, Mr. Baldwin, and many of its stockholders were amongst the most reputable of the citizens of the United States, and, if indeed one or two of its employés did not prove worthy of its trust, I shall show presently that you may discard all the testimony of those employés and that the Mexican testimony here supports this claim.

Now, Mr. President, going on with the text of this award of Sir Edward Thornton, and speaking of the invitation and of its acceptance and of their right to rely for full protection upon the Mexican Government, he says this as to the character of the evidence adduced before him:

The evidence on the part of the claimants is, in the umpire's opinion, of great weight; the witnesses are for the most part highly respectable, and men of intelligence; and their testimony bears the impress of truth. Notwithstanding what is stated to the contrary by the witnesses produced by the defense, the umpire is constrained to believe that the local authorities at Tayoltita and San Dimas, far from affording to the claimants that protection and assistance which had been promised them by the Mexican Government, and to which they were entitled by treaty, not only showed themselves a spirit of bitter hostility to the company, but encouraged their countrymen who were employed by the claimants in similar behavior, and even frightened them into refusing to work for their American employers. The conduct of these authorities was such, and the incessant annoyance of and interference with the claimants was so vexatious and unjustifiable, that the umpire is not surprised that they considered it useless to attempt to carry on their operations, and that for this reason, as well as from the well-grounded fear that their lives were in danger, they resolved to abandon the enterprise. These facts are not, in the umpire's opinion, at all refuted or even weakened by the evidence submitted by the defense; on the contrary, he believes that the local authorities were determined to drive the claimants out of the country.

Much has been said of Exall. He was at one time the local manager of this company in Mexico. He wrote many letters from Mexico, and I have no desire either to mitigate or to pervert in any degree my sense of the duplicity with which he acted. In my judgment his letters, which are now disclosed in this case and are spread upon the record, are inconsistent with the statements which he had formerly made, and put him most seriously upon explanation, if indeed they were possible to be explained in their contradictory relations.

Exall has been dead for many years. That is a circumstance to be weighed, but I admit that it can not destroy utterly the right of Mexico to prove her case as she will. She examined her own witnesses upon that point, and Sir Edward Thornton says that, by their own witnesses, they did not refute those facts, which he regarded as beyond disputation; and in the State Department of the United States, whether we consider it when Mr. Fish gave the whole matter the go-by whether when Mr. Evarts said the only question here is the measure of damages, not that of the wrong, whether yesterday when Mr. Bayard repeated the same sentiment in different language, you have this matter before the Senate, that an American enterprise and American citizens were broken up in Mexico by outrage, and that, at the end of seventeen years, we are asked to set aside a fair, impartial, just, and enlightened arbitrament, which was claimed to be final, merely because it is now alleged the damages were excessive.

Now, I propose to show by the very inherent force of this opinion of Sir Edward Thornton, and by the facts in this case, which rest upon the testimony of witnesses who are not impugned, that these damages were not excessive, or, if excessive, so little so in a matter of this magnitude that for such a proceeding as this the maxim of the law would apply de minimis non exerat lex. Let us see how Sir Edward Thornton arrived at the damages which should be paid by Mexico. Three million dollars, I believe, were the damages claimed, and if all the circumstances which I have previously related, the capture of mule trains, forced loans, the seizure of money, the murder of an employé, the imprisonment of Exall, the carrying off of rich ores—for all these things damages were claimed and assessed in the minds of the claimants at $3,000,000. Now let us see what this umpire did when the American commissioner and the Mexican commissioner differed.

What the amount of this compensation should be—

Says he—

it is very difficult to decide. The umpire is of opinion that the claimants should be reimbursed the amount of their expenditures and also the value of the ores extracted which they were forced to abandon, with interest upon both these sums. He can not consent to make any award on account of prospective gains, nor on account of the so-called value of the mines. Mining is proverbially the most uncertain of undertakings; mines of the very best reputation and character suddenly come to an end, either from the exhaustion of the veins, or from flooding, or from some of the innumerable difficulties which cross the miner's path. A certain interest upon the money invested is a much surer compensation than prospective gains; the latter are, in fact, the interest upon the sums invested; they may be greater or less, or none at all, and there may even be great losses of capital.

To award both interest and prospective gains would be to award the same thing twice over. The so-called value of the mines must depend upon the prospective gains. It may be great, small, or nothing, and may be but a mere snare to lead one on to utter ruin. It is, in the opinion of the umpire, equally admissible that the Mexican Government can be called upon to pay a value the amount of which, even approximately, it is impossible to decide. A moderate interest on the amount invested in the business, and upon the amount of the ores reduced and of those extracted and deposited at the reduction work, is a further compensation which, in the opinion of the umpire, that Government ought to pay.

* * * * * * *

Any so-called "forced loans" and contributions must have been paid out of this amount. To charge them therefore separately is to make the same charge twice over.

Then he goes on to advert upon these various circumstances:

The umpire is satisfied, from the respectable evidence produced, that a large quantity of valuable ore has been extracted from the mines and deposited at the company's mill, and that it was there when the superintendent was compelled, by the conduct of the local authorities, to abandon the mines and cease working them.

What are the items in which he sums up these damages? In the first place he takes the evidence of George C. Collins, not of Exall, not of anyone who is impugned by these records and by these arguments; he takes the "evidence of George C. Collins with regard to the amount invested," which he says—is straightforward, and, according to it, said amount consisted in the following:

From subscriptions and sale of shares	$235,000.00
From loans and advances	64,291.06
Due for rents, salaries, and law expenses	42,500.00
	341,791.06

Then follow the words "at $100,000," and he gives a decree for that amount, not going off into speculation, not following mule trains or murders, or any of the things which have been paraded in the record as a refutation of these claims, but taking the facts in this case, which have not been and can not be denied, and which even the State Department of the United States in its various messages to-day concedes that here was an outrage in which American citizens were broken up in their enterprise, their mines destroyed, their money made nil. He simply gives them back that of which they were deprived; and I should like to ask where in this record is that judgment impugned and where is the testimony upon which it rests successfully overthrown?

Concede that Exall was full of duplicity, that he said one thing in one place and another thing in another; here were Mexican witnesses, some twenty or thirty in number; here was an array of American witnesses, and not one of them has yet been followed or treated by Mexico as if he had done her any wrong in the testimony which he gave on oath before this court. What became of these Mexican witnesses down at the La Abra mine? Mexico is there with her full sovereign power exercised over that mine. Has she had any of them arrested for perjury and tried them in her courts? Here were these Mexicans living for years; one, two, three, four, five, or six years in the United States. Were any proceedings instituted against them? Now the time has gone by, the men have gone by, and Exall and Bartholow and Cryder and the long list of them are resting in the silence of the tomb.

It is said that the British arbiter valued the silver ore upon the ground a little too high upon testimony which was only cumulative, and that, notwithstanding the body of testimony in that record before him, the arbitrament must be set aside at the importunity and insistence of a State, which promised to say nothing else, but to let it stand.

Sir, if international arbitration in its very conception and birth is to sink into this contemptuous attitude in the Senate of the United States, the nations had better open their gunshops and arsenals again, for it will prove no substitute for the sword. It will only invite it by its criminations and its recriminations and its prolongation of strife, and in the end all the bitterness engendered by broken treaties and by lobbies, and by agreements, which would not be tolerated by an honest chancellor in a court of justice, the edge of the sword, and the point of it would be keener than if such a substitute had never been attempted or known.

For one, Mr. President, I shall not vote to open this award. It is not satisfactory to me, I confess. If I had heard this case as a juryman I might have given a different judgment, but no court will ever set aside a verdict which has been rendered by a jury because one part of the testimony is impugned, or because he would have rendered a different verdict if there had been enough of solid matter left before the court upon which a verdict might have been predicated. No one can read this plain, sensible, honest, common sense opinion of Sir Edward Thornton without seeing in it the mind of the enlightened lawyer and the hand of a chancellor who knew how to hold the scales. He did not go off in any sky-scraping speculation. He did not follow the vicissitudes of the revolution. He only said, "Your revolutionists in Mexico have broken up this American camp and destroyed their business. Give them back what they put into it, without any prospective damages at all, and we will call it even and quit. You have not denied nor shown nor is there any fair testimony in this record from which the inference could be drawn that three hundred and odd thousand dollars were not put there." It is admitted that its usefulness was destroyed, and, on behalf of our citizens, I do not feel conscience-smitten to restore to a Government, at her importunity, a sum which she has paid in recompense, and which, in my opinion, she justly owed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TURPIE in the chair). The question is on the motion of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL], to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

The motion was not agreed to.

PRINTING AND DISTRIBUTION OF DOCUMENTS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. What is the further pleasure of the Senate?

Mr. MANDERSON. The special order has been placed before the Senate, I believe.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 1549) providing for the public printing and binding and the distribution of public documents.

Mr. FAULKNER. If the Senator from Nebraska does not desire to proceed with that bill this evening, I shall move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, February 2, 1892, at 12 o'clock meridian.

CONFIRMATIONS.

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate, January 23, 1892.

BOARD OF ORDNANCE AND FORTIFICATIONS.

Byron M. Cutcheon, of Michigan, to be a civilian member of the Board of Ordnance and Fortifications.

POSTMASTER.

Cadwallader J. Pride, to be postmaster at Rock Hill, in the county of York and State of South Carolina.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, February 1, 1892.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of Saturday's proceedings was read and approved.

CORRECTION.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts rises, as the Chair understands, to a correction of the RECORD.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. Speaker, as I understand the rules under which we have been acting, a member can not extend his remarks in the RECORD unless he has the permission of the House so to do, although he can make a reasonable revision of his remarks. I desire to call the attention of the House to a speech made by my colleague from Massachusetts [Mr. MORSE] as it appears on pages 670 and 671 of the RECORD. In that speech I interrupted to ask that my colleague be granted further time, as I said, "for the benefit of the Democratic party in Massachusetts." The written speech of my colleague which he handed to the Reporters did not contain any of the remarks which I now desire to read to the House.

My friend from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] will need benefit and assistance the next time he is a candidate on the Democratic ticket in his district. But, Mr. Speaker, I want to call attention to these fish-peddlers, and perhaps the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] can tell the House where the funds came from to carry on that kind of a campaign. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, if I did not want to defend the Republican side of the House in this matter I should not speak, but they have never laughed at that old fish-peddler story since the day when they sprung it on the country and it did not work. I wish to say that I hold in my hand the original manuscript of my colleague, and also what he dictated in the office of the official stenographer afterward. The manuscript contains none of those last words which I have just read, nor does this report which he dictated to the official stenographer. But even that last report did not satisfy him, and he amended it by adding in his own handwriting, "Laughter on the Republican side." [Laughter.] I desire further to say that his imagination was perfectly truthful, for the punctuation of applause that he ascribes to the Republican party is that in regard to remarks which he never delivered; and I know the gentleman from Massachusetts well enough to know that remarks which he never delivers are sure to obtain Republican applause. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MORSE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say, in reply to the remarks of my colleague [Mr. HOAR], that the statement just made by him is largely and substantially false. The words which he quoted as not delivered by me, in which I said I desired to speak about these fish-peddlers, etc., are from the report of the stenographer and appear in his report; and they were incident to the interruption made by the gentleman himself; and where "applause" occurs there was applause, as is well known to every member on this side.

In what I interjected into that speech, I simply exercised the privilege which is allowed to every member of the House to revise his manuscript to finish a subject or to supply omissions.

It was remarked to me in this connection by one of the Reporters' assistants that I spoke so fast on that occasion that it would be difficult for the stenographers to take down and transcribe what I did say. [Derisive laughter on the Democratic side.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, my young friend from Massachusetts will be wiser when he is older. He is reported to have shed tears over your election. [Laughter on the Republican side.] He is reported to have wet his couch with tears because his candidate for Speaker was defeated. He had seen in the distance a chairmanship and a clerk and honor and fame and celebrity throughout the extent of the country, and especially in his district in Massachusetts. Those fond hopes were dashed to the ground by the defeat of his candidate for Speaker and by your election, Mr. Speaker.

Once more: That young gentleman, through the campaign in which he was elected, declared that the Democratic party of the country stood for honest money, and that the Republican party was the party of cheap money. He will be wiser when he is older. He belongs to the "kindergarten class" at present. [Laughter on the Republican side.] By the time this Congress has closed he will understand the position of the Democratic party in regard to the "free and unlimited coinage of silver," and with reference to the tariff, "free raw material," and other great economic questions. I repeat once more, Mr. Speaker, that the statement made by the gentleman from Massachusetts in regard to certain statements which I put into my speech are substantially untrue; and the stenographers will bear me out in the statement that they were largely incident to the interruption made by the gentleman himself.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. Speaker, I merely want to say in addition to what I did say (not replying to such of the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts as are not pertinent to this question), that I hold in my hand the official stenographer's report of the part of his speech now under criticism; and from that I have quoted. I have the official stenographer's word that the gentleman came into his office and said he did not want that report to appear in print; and he then dictated to the typewriter the words which I have quoted from the RECORD; and then, not content with having that alteration made, he added in his own handwriting, "Laughter on the Republican side." I desire, Mr. Speaker, simply to make that statement as coming from the official stenographer of the House.

I never reply to the remarks of any gentleman when they are personal and impertinent to myself. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

COMMERCE.

By Mr. GRADY: A bill (H. R. 5103) to regulate one species of "commerce between the States" and "with foreign nations," and for other purposes—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

NORTHEAST BRANCH OF CAPE FEAR RIVER, NORTH CAROLINA.

By Mr. GRADY: A bill (H. R. 5104) making an appropriation for the improvement of Northeast Branch of Cape Fear River in North Carolina—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

STREET IMPROVEMENTS, CINCINNATI.

By Mr. STORER: A bill (H. R. 5105) fixing the proportion of the United States of the cost of improved streets in Cincinnati, and authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to pay the same.

The SPEAKER. This bill, the Chair thinks, should go to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. STORER. Mr. Speaker, my own opinion is that it ought to go to the Committee on the Judiciary, as the question involved is purely a legal one.

The SPEAKER. From such examination as the Chair has been able to give the bill, it appears to provide that the United States shall pay for certain pavement in front of the public building in Cincinnati, and therefore the Chair thinks that it should go to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. STORER. I would remind the Speaker that a similar bill introduced by a gentleman from Nebraska was withdrawn from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds and referred to the Committee on Appropriations. I thought at the time that that was not in accordance with the rules, and therefore I ask that this bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. DOCKERY. If the Chair will permit me a remark in that connection, I will suggest that there is no law authorizing the Committee on Appropriations to provide for such an object, and therefore I think the bill ought to go to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, or to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not see how, under the rule, this bill can properly go to the Committee on the Judiciary; but if the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. STORER] makes that motion, the Chair will put it to the House.

Mr. STORER. Then I make that motion, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. STORER] moves that the bill, the title of which has been read and which the Chair thinks ought to be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. Is the House ready for the question?

Mr. REILLY. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the bill be read.

The bill was read in full.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, is it in order to move to refer that bill to the Committee on the Judiciary? I make that inquiry for the reason that my recollection is that the Government of the United States has never undertaken to make appropriations for such an object as is contemplated in that bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair held that the bill should properly go to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and that it ought not to go to the Committee on Appropriations, because there was no law authorizing such an appropriation to be made.

Mr. BLOUNT. I understand that; but I ask whether it would not be in order to move to refer the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary in order that that committee might report to the House in relation to the policy adopted, or to be adopted, in this class of claims. The bill proposes, I think, to inaugurate an entirely new policy.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule, as the Chair understands it, any gentleman may move the reference of a bill to a different committee from that to which the Chair thinks it should go, and the question must be decided without debate.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, matters of that character, so far as I know, have always been referred to the Committee on Appropriations—that is to say, such propositions as the one contained in the latter portion of this bill. The matter in the first part of the bill might perhaps go to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, but the part proposing an appropriation should go to the Appropriations Committee, and I move that reference.

Mr. DOCKERY. If I may be allowed a suggestion——

The SPEAKER. This debate is proceeding by unanimous consent.

Mr. DOCKERY. I was going to suggest that, from the reading of the second paragraph of the bill, it seems to be in the nature of a claim, and therefore ought to go to the Committee on Claims.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. STORER] moves to refer this bill to the Committee on the Judiciary, and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] moves to amend so as to refer the bill to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. HOLMAN. I withdraw my amendment.

The motion of Mr. STORER was then agreed to, and the bill was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

MONUMENT AT FORT RECOVERY, OHIO.

By Mr. GANTZ: A bill (H. R. 5106) to provide for the erection of a monument at Fort Recovery, Mercer County, Ohio—to the Committee on the Library.

FOUNDRY AT NORFOLK NAVY-YARD.

By Mr. O'FERRALL: A joint resolution of the senate and house of delegates of Virginia, requesting the United States Government to locate a foundry at, and extend the limits of, the Norfolk navy-yard, etc.—referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and by unanimous consent ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas two modern steel vessels, the United States battle ship Texas and the United States cruiser Raleigh, are now rapidly approaching completion at the Norfolk navy-yard, attesting the efficiency of our Virginia mechanics and skilled laborers, and superior advantages of the location for steel shipbuilding: and

Whereas it has been demonstrated that the State of Virginia contains unlimited supply of coal and iron ore for the economical making of steel of the highest grades: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the house of delegates of Virginia (the senate concurring), That the Government of the United States be, and is hereby, requested to locate a foundry at, and extend the limits of, said Norfolk navy-yard so as to make it complete in every respect for constructing the most improved, powerful, and efficient steel battle ships, and to make appropriations for, and to order, as soon as the aforesaid Texas and Raleigh are off the ways, the construction of other steel ships at the said navy-yard, instead of letting them to contractors.

Resolved, further, That our Senators and Representatives in the Congress of the United States be, and they are hereby, requested to take such action in the premises as they may deem requisite for the accomplishment of the object of these resolutions, and the clerks of both houses are hereby directed to transmit to the President and Secretaries of War and Navy of the United States, and to our Senators and Representatives in Congress, certified copies of these resolutions.

Agreed to by house of delegates January 20, 1892.

J. BELL BIGGER, C. H. D.

Agreed to by the Senate January 26, 1892.

J. D PENDLETON, C. S.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads to report back the bill (H. R. 581) to regulate the appointment of fourth-class postmasters, to ask that that committee be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and that it be referred to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service.

The SPEAKER. The Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads will be discharged from the further consideration of the bill and it will be referred to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, without objection.

MEDAL TO OFFICERS AND CREW OF THE UNITED STATES STEAMER BALTIMORE.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, I offer the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk, and ask that it be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A joint resolution (H. Res. 80) authorizing the acceptance of medals presented to the officers and crew of the United States steamer Baltimore by the King of Sweden.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Now, Mr, Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration. It is a small matter, and I trust there will be no objection to it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which will be read by the Clerk.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. Speaker, I call for the regular order. I think bills should be introduced first. I have a resolution which I should like to introduce.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Then I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The SPEAKER. The joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

REPORTS AND OTHER PUBLIC DOCUMENTS OF THE DEPARTMENTS.

By Mr. CUMMINGS: A resolution asking for information as to the publication of reports and other public documents by the State, Treasury, War, Interior, and Agricultural Departments—to the Committee on Rules.

INCREASED PENSION FOR DEAFNESS IN CERTAIN CASES.

By Mr. HOLMAN: A bill (H. R. 5177) to increase the pension rate in certain cases of deafness—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up for consideration the report of the Committee on Rules.

Mr. COCKRAN. I ask the gentleman to withhold that for a moment while I present a resolution for present consideration.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. COCKRAN. I offer the resolution which I send to the desk, and ask for its adoption.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That Saturday, February 13, beginning at 2 o'clock p. m., be set apart for paying tribute to the memory of Hon. Francis B. Spinola, late a member of the House of Representatives from the Tenth district of the State of New York.

The resolution was adopted.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. McCOOK, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. 3931) to detach Montgomery County from the western and add it to the eastern district of Arkansas.

It also announced that the Senate had passed with an amendment the bill (H. R. 2785) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend the general incorporation law of the District of Columbia," approved May 17, 1882.

It also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which concurrence was requested:

A bill (S. 53) to reimburse certain persons who expended moneys and furnished services and supplies in repelling invasions and suppressing Indian hostilities within the territorial limits of the present State of Nevada;

A bill (S. 56) for the erection of a public building at Reno, State of Nevada;

A bill (S. 80) providing for the completion of the public building in the city of Pensacola, Fla., as originally designed;

A bill (S. 211) for the relief of the sureties of Dennis Murphy;

A bill (S 821) to provide for a term of the circuit and district court at Littleton N. H.;

A bill (S. 1134) for the relief of purchasers of land within the limits of the Umatilla Indian Reservation;

A bill (S. 1270) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public thereon at Kansas City, in the State of Kansas;

A bill (S. 1379) to provide for a pension for Obe Sutherland, late a teamster in the Quartermaster's Department of the United States volunteer army; and

A bill (S. 1503) to establish a first-order light-house on North Head, Cape Disappointment, in the State of Washington.

THE RULES.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Mr. Speaker, I now call up for consideration the report of the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the pending amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. HOOKER: Amend paragraph 51 by striking out the following:

"It shall always be in order to call up for consideration a report from the Committee on Rules, and pending the consideration the Speaker may entertain one motion that the House adjourn; but after the result is announced he shall not entertain any other dilatory motion until the said report shall have been fully disposed of."

Amendment by Mr. OATES: Paragraph 51, amend the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] by adding:

"And insert the following:

"'That there shall be a Committee on Order of Business, to consist of fifteen members; ten of said members, including the Speaker, shall be Democrats, and five of said members shall be of the opposition. The members of said committee shall be selected by their respective caucuses, and the Speaker shall be ex officio chairman of said committee. Its jurisdiction shall be to consider and report upon all propositions as to the order, consideration, and precedence of business other than that prescribed by the rules of the House, and said committee shall have the right to report at any time.'"

Mr. CATCHINGS. I move the previous question on the adoption of paragraph 51 of Rule XI and all pending amendments.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to inquire whether we are considering Rule XI.

The SPEAKER. Yes; paragraph 51 of Rule XI.

Mr. PICKLER. I desire to offer an amendment to that paragraph.

The SPEAKER. That is the paragraph upon which the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CATCHINGS] has just demanded the previous question. If that demand is sustained no amendment is in order.

Mr. PICKLER. I ask for the reading of my amendment.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I object, Mr. Speaker. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CATCHINGS] demands the previous question upon paragraph 51 of Rule XI and all pending amendments.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The question is not debatable.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. I do not rise to debate, but simply to appeal to my colleague [Mr. CATCHINGS] to withdraw his demand for the previous question, in order that I may be heard upon the amendment, as I had the honor to make the motion to strike out.

The question was taken on ordering the previous question; and there were—ayes 70, noes 20, and the Speaker declared that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. I call for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 70, noes 20.

Mr. PICKLER. No quorum, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The point having been made that no quorum has voted, the Chair will appoint tellers.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; 57 members voting in favor thereof.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Speaker, I suggest that time might be saved in this way. I understand that the gentleman from Dakota [Mr. PICKLER] simply desires to have his amendment considered, not debated; and I think the gentleman from Mississippi will save time by letting that be done.

Mr. PICKLER. I will say to the gentleman in charge of this report that I find that by that report the Committee on Invalid Pensions is excluded from being a privileged committee, and I wish to offer an amendment to make the rule conform in that respect to the rule of the Fifty-first Congress.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Regular order, Mr. Speaker.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 153, nays 79, not voting 99; as follows:

So the previous question was ordered.

The following pairs were announced:

Until further notice:

Mr. BUNN with Mr. ATKINSON.

Mr. STEVENS with Mr. RANDALL.

Mr. COBB of Alabama with Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois.

For this day:

Mr. SCOTT with Mr. HITT.

Mr. MOSES with Mr. MILLIKEN.

Mr. FOWLER with Mr. RUSSELL.

Mr. HARE with Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR, on this vote.

Mr. CADMUS with Mr. CUTTING, until Tuesday next.

Mr. GEISSENHAINER with Mr. BERGEN, from half past 3 to-day until 12 o'clock Tuesday.

Mr. HEMPHILL with Mr. GROUT, on all political questions except the rules until further notice.

Mr. PICKLER. I ask for a verification of the roll call.

The SPEAKER. Has the gentleman any reason to think that it is not correct? There is no rule providing for such verification, but if the gentleman has any reason to apprehend——

Mr. PICKLER. I think that in this general running fire of voting it is very uncertain whether all gentlemen voted as they desired to do.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman thinks there is any inaccuracy, the Chair will order the recapitulation with pleasure.

Mr. PICKLER. I ask for the verification.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman does not come up to the rule as stated by the Chair. The Chair will not order the recapitulation unless the gentleman states that he has reason to apprehend some inaccuracy. If he does so, the Chair will order it.

Mr. PICKLER. There has been a great deal of confusion, and a great many gentlemen have voted out of the regular order.

The SPEAKER. There is no rule——

Mr. PICKLER. There is no rule for gentlemen coming in and voting on a second roll call, but they have done so.

The SPEAKER. There is no rule preventing it.

Mr. PICKLER. I demand a verification of the roll call, owing to the great confusion there has been in the voting.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will hand the Chair the result of the vote. [A pause.] On this question the yeas are 153, the nays 79. The yeas have it, and the previous question is ordered.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The previous question having been ordered, no debate is in order.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. PICKLER. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question being taken on the motion to adjourn, it was not agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 3, noes 139.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES], which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk again read the amendment of Mr. OATES, as published in the previous proceedings.

The SPEAKER (having put the question on agreeing to the amendment) said: The "noes" seem to have it.

Mr. PICKLER. I call for a division.

The question being again taken, there were—ayes 28, noes 103.

Mr. PICKLER. No quorum, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman makes the point that no quorum has voted——

Mr. PICKLER. When pension legislation—— [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman must be in order.

Mr. PICKLER again tried to make himself heard amid cries of "Regular order!"

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can accomplish nothing by the course he is pursuing.

Mr. PICKLER again endeavored to speak, amid the rapping of the Speaker's gavel and cries of "Order!"

The SPEAKER. The Reporters will not put in the RECORD any remarks of the gentleman thus made out of order.

Mr. PICKLER still endeavored to make himself heard amid confusion and shouts of "Order!"

The SPEAKER. The Sergeant-at-Arms will preserve order on the floor. The gentleman from South Dakota is out of order and will please take his seat.

Mr. PICKLER resumed his seat, as the Deputy Sergeant-at-Arms, bearing the mace, was approaching him.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CATCHINGS] and the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. PICKLER] will please take their places as tellers.

Mr. OATES. I submit that the two tellers voted on the same side of the question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Dakota made the point that no quorum voted.

Mr. OATES. He made the point, but he voted on the same side as the gentleman from Mississippi.

The SPEAKER. That may be true, but the gentleman made the point——

Mr. PICKLER. The gentleman is mistaken. I might have been standing up at the time the count was taken, but I voted on the other side.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thought the gentleman ought to be appointed a teller, he having made the point of no quorum.

Mr. PICKLER. I voted as I shot. I always do.

Mr. BUTLER. He shot as he was ordered, and votes the same way.

Mr. ALDERSON. The shooting ended, my friends, about thirty years ago. [Laughter.]

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 19, noes 155.

So the amendment was rejected.

The question recurred upon the amendment of Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I ask that the amendment be read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Mississippi.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out of clause 51, Rule XI: It shall always be in order to call up for consideration a report from the Committee on Rules, and pending the consideration the Speaker may entertain one motion that the House adjourn; but after the result is announced, he shall not entertain any other dilatory motion until the said report shall have been fully disposed of.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 21, noes 139.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. I ask for the yeas and nays on that proposition.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

So (no further count being demanded) the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have the privilege of extending some remarks in the RECORD upon this question, not having been able to secure an opportunity of debating it on the floor of the House.

Mr. OATES. I would like, Mr. Speaker, that the permission should be made general, as there are some points to which I desire also to refer.

Mr. OWENS. I object.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the next paragraph of the rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

52. No committee shall sit during the sittings of the House without special leave.

Mr. McCREARY. I desire to offer an amendment to follow this clause of the rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

It shall be the duty of the several committees having jurisdiction of the general appropriation bills to report said appropriation bills (except the general deficiency bill) within eighty days after the committees are announced in a long session, and within forty days after the commencement of a short session; and if any committee fail to so report, the reasons of such failure shall be privileged for consideration when called for by any member of the House.

Mr. McCREARY. Mr. Speaker, in regard to this amendment——

Mr. CATCHINGS. If my friend from Kentucky will allow me to interrupt him, I desire to state that I am willing to accept the amendment, as far as I am concerned.

Mr. McCREARY. I understand, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman in charge of the report of the Committee on Rules will accept the amendment, and unless there is some other objection I shall not make any additional remarks, only to say that this rule was in force for forty-two years, in twenty-one Congresses, and it is not necessary for me to say anything further unless objection is made or some gentleman takes the floor in opposition.

Mr. DINGLEY. Before the vote is taken I should like to inquire of the gentleman offering the amendment as to whether it is intended to mean eighty days—in this session—from the date of the announcement of the committees, or eighty days after the adoption of the rule?

Mr. McCREARY. I would agree that it should only take effect after the adoption of the rules.

Mr. DINGLEY. If that is the understanding I think there would be no difficulty about it. But I call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to the fact that it would be absolutely impossible to report all of the general appropriation bills within twenty or thirty days from to-day, which would be required according to one construction of the rule.

Mr. McCREARY. The gentleman from Maine, I think, is mistaken in the construction he places upon it. It provides that the appropriation bills shall be reported within eighty days from the commencement of the session in a long session, and within forty days from the commencement of a short session. But provision is also made that if the committee fails to do that, upon a statement of the chairman of the committee in charge of the appropriation bills, giving sufficient reasons for the failure, further time may be granted by the House. The object is simply to have these bills reported within the first eighty days of the session of Congress, and, as I have said, if there is a failure to do so it is for the House to determine whether the reason for the failure is satisfactory or otherwise.

I have just stated, Mr. Speaker, that this was the rule of the House for forty-two years, operating through twenty-one Congresses.

Mr. DINGLEY. Undoubtedly it could be done without difficulty in the earlier days of the country, and it probably can be done now if the construction is eighty days from to-day.

Mr. McCREARY. I would suggest to the gentleman from Maine that the Committee on Appropriations was first appointed in 1865, and from that time down to 1880 the general appropriation bills were reported usually, nearly all of them, in January and February, but in later years, in the last ten or twelve years, the appropriation bills have many of them been reported in June, July, or August.

Now, if there is good cause at any time why the general appropriation bills are not reported within the eighty days, or in the short session within the forty days, there will be no trouble in getting an extension of the time. The object is simply to hasten the reporting of the appropriation bills; and that is particularly necessary since a rule will be passed allowing new legislation on such bills.

I believe the rule is in the interest not only of economy and short sessions, but in the interest of the transaction of the public business by allowing every member of the House to have an opportunity to examine and understand the composition of the general appropriation bills.

Mr. DINGLEY. I am entirely in favor of it.

Mr. BURROWS. Everybody is for it.

Mr. McCREARY. Then I ask for a vote upon it.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

RULE XII.

DELEGATES.

The Speaker shall appoint from among the Delegates one additional member on each of the following committees, viz: Coinage, Weights, and Measures; Agriculture; Military Affairs; Post-Office and Post-Roads; Public Lands; Indian Affairs; Territories; Private Land Claims; and Mines and Mining; and they shall possess in their respective committees the same powers and privileges as in the House, and may make any motion except to reconsider.

Mr. BRYAN. I move to strike out the last word. It is not because I have any special dislike for that last word, but I desire at this time and under this motion to convey to the House an item of news, which I am sure it will be glad to receive. In 1890 the people of Nebraska, by a plurality of more than 1,000 votes, elected Hon. James E. Boyd as governor of that State.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I rise to inquire if this is in order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not, if the gentleman makes the point.

Mr. BRYAN. If the gentleman will wait a moment——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine makes the point that the gentleman confine himself in his remarks to the pending amendment.

Mr. BRYAN. The gentleman will see the propriety of my remarks later.

Mr. DINGLEY. I will withdraw the point. I had the point made on myself on Saturday, and I only desired to know whether the other gentlemen were allowed to speak out of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks, the point being made, that the gentleman must confine himself to the question before the House.

Mr. BRYAN. The ex-governor contested the election, on the ground that Mr. Boyd, although for forty years a resident of Nebraska, twice mayor of Omaha, and a member of two constitutional conventions, was not a citizen of the State within the provisions of the Constitution. The State court by a vote of two to one declared Mr. Boyd not a citizen. I wish to announce to the House that the United States Supreme Court has just declared Governor Boyd a citizen and entitled to the office. The news is thus conveyed to you that this House may join with the people of Nebraska in rejoicing over the restoration of popular government in that State. [Applause on the Democratic side.] In view, however, of the objection made, I will withdraw the proposed amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I wish to offer an amendment to Rule XII, which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend Rule XII by striking out the word "Territories," where it occurs, and after the word "mining" insert the words "and two on the Committee on Territories."

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. Speaker, the object of that amendment is simply to place two Delegates from the Territories upon the Committee on Territories. I do not think there can be any objection to it, and certainly none from the committee itself. Those Territories are now seeking to be heard on the question of statehood, and it seems to me only fair that at least two of the Delegates should be represented upon that committee. I have consulted members of the Committee on Rules as I could get to see them, and they have expressed no objection whatever to this amendment.

Mr. McMILLIN. As stated by the gentleman from Arizona, he did consult with me and I think consulted with my colleague [Mr. CATCHINGS] on the question, and we have thought that if it is the will of the House to concur in that idea, that there was nothing unreasonable in this demand, especially in view of the fact that the question of admission of the Territories to statehood is of such great importance to the Territories; and having no power to vote, they should have power to consult.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of this amendment. I live in a State which was very lately a Territory, and I know what are the feelings of the people in a Territory. I am in favor of this resolution, further, for the following reasons: I see that the majority of the Committee on Rules in reporting Rule XI, which I was seeking a few minutes ago to amend by reinstating the Committee on Invalid Pensions as a privileged committee, that the Committee on Rules have not only cut out of the rules of the Fifty-first Congress the right of this committee as a privileged committee, but they have also cut out the Committee on the Territories from the right to report at any time bills for the admission of States.

Mr. BUTLER. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa will state it.

Mr. BUTLER. We have passed Rule XI, and it was closed before several members had opportunity to present amendments, and I think arguments on Rule XI are not in order.

Mr. PICKLER. That is no information to this side of the House that we have passed Rule XI. I ascertained myself that Rule XI was passed; but what I was saying is directly in point. I am in favor of giving the Territories this additional Delegate upon the committee, especially for the reason that the Committee on Rules have debarred the Committee on Territories from reporting at any time upon the admission of States, thus changing the provision in the rule of the Fifty-first Congress. I agree with my friend that the amendment should be adopted.

Mr. McMILLIN. It is only necessary to state, in response to one remark of the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. PICKLER], in order that there should be no mistake about it, that the rules provide what has been the rule all along heretofore, until the last Congress, concerning night sessions for the consideration of pension bills. It is the object of the committee to do it again, and the gentleman need not vex his soul with the fear as to their being no consideration of that subject. I ask for a vote on the question.

Mr. PICKLER. It is a good time to get the cakes when they are passing them.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

RULE XIII.

CALENDARS.

1. There shall be three Calendars of business reported from the committees, viz:

First. A Calendar of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union: to which shall be referred bills raising revenue, general appropriation bills, and bills of a public character, directly or indirectly appropriating money or property;

Second. A House Calendar, to which shall be referred all bills of a public character not raising revenue nor directly or indirectly appropriating money or property; and Third. A Calendar of the Committee of the Whole House, to which shall be referred all bills of a private character.

2. The question of reference of any proposition, other than that reported from a committee, shall be decided without debate, in the following order, viz: a standing committee, a select committee; but the reference of a proposition reported by a committee, when demanded, shall be decided according to its character, without debate, in the following order, viz: House Calendar, Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Committee of the Whole House, a standing committee, a select committee.

Mr. ENLOE. Mr. Speaker, I have an amendment which I desire to offer to that section.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend Rule XIII by adding the following:

"All reports of committees on private bills, together with the views of the minority, shall be delivered to the Clerk for printing and reference to the proper Calendar under the direction of the Speaker in accordance with the foregoing clause, and the titles or subjects thereof shall be entered on the Journal and printed in the RECORD."

Mr. ENLOE. I offer this amendment in order to make the practice in respect to reports from committees on bills of a private nature correspond with the rule in respect to the introduction of private bills and memorials.

There is no reason why the time of the House should be consumed in calling the roll of committees every morning, to have reports submitted upon the numerous private bills that are before the various committees of the House. This was the rule of the Fifty-first Congress on all reports, and we found it a very convenient one; it aided very greatly in expediting the business of the House.

I hope that the House will adopt this amendment. I will ask at the proper time that Rule XXII be made to conform to this amendment with reference to submitting these reports. I think these amendments will prove a great saving of the time of the House. So far as public bills are concerned it is proposed to have them read at the desk, so that gentlemen may know what bills of a public character have been introduced in the House without having to refer to the RECORD, though I think the later rule on that subject is the better one. For the same reason some gentlemen desire that the reports on bills of a public character shall be announced to the House, so that they may be heard, and save members the trouble of looking them up in the RECORD. But no one desires, as I understand, that that course shall be pursued with reference to private bills. Therefore, I hope the amendment will be adopted, and that the House will make the provision of Rule XXII conform to it when we reach that rule.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, the course pursued by the Fifty-first Congress was not recommended to this House, because we thought that the question of the introduction of bills and their reference to appropriate calendars was a proper matter for the House to determine for itself. Then as to this suggestion of my colleague as to how the committees have to be called under the general rule, we have recommended a return to the old rule on that subject, going far back in the history of the Government, I believe, as to the call of committees for reports. Now, that has to be done whether they report a private or a public bill.

Mr. REED. Will the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] permit me to make the suggestion to him that it was not the custom to call the committees for reports simply at any time before the Forty-ninth Congress?

Mr. MCMILLIN. I will not be certain how it was in the Forty-sixth and Forty-seventh Congresses, but I do know it was the rule for a number of Congresses until the last Congress.

Mr. REED. Not until since the Forty-ninth Congress. From the early history of this Government the committees could report for action; and until Mr. Randall was Speaker the morning hour could be extended over the whole day, as was the case in the Fifty-first Congress; so that the action of the Fifty-first Congress was a return to the ancient practice. The rule reported by the gentleman from Tennessee is a resistance of the old rules, and a temporary modern innovation; and as the gentleman is very much in favor of standing by precedent, I hope he will select a model one.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I will stand by the precedents that are best, and would not give preference to the precedents of the last Congress. Mr. Speaker, in the Forty-sixth Congress I know there was a revision of the rules, and in the main we have adopted or codified their proposition on this subject. I will not be certain about that, but I do know that there was a change in this regard by the Fifty-first Congress. That change we have not followed. We think the question of reference to the Calendar should be determined by the House, if the House sees fit so to determine.

Mr. ENLOE. Mr. Speaker, I want to say that I have great reverence for the ancient customs and usages of the House and great respect for precedents when they happen to be founded on some good reason; but when there is no reason given that is satisfactory to my mind why we should adhere to a precedent I have no respect for its age. This House has passed judgment before in adopting a resolution upon the question of the introduction and reference of private bills and petitions, and has directed them to be introduced through the petition box. The Committee on Rules has conformed to that recommendation of the House, and that is the course they will take when this code of rules is adopted. Therefore, I can not see where the business of the House would be promoted, or where any public interest would be promoted by adhering to the old custom and consuming the time of this House for a half or three-quarters of an hour every morning by calling every committee on the list to report every private bill that is before the House, and for that reason I am in favor of the rule of the Fifty-first Congress, or the older rule, as the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] suggests.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Will my friend from Tennessee answer this question? Does he not think, even if his amendment should be adopted to this rule, that there should be call of committees for reports?

Mr. ENLOE. There will be a call of committees for reports, but gentlemen will not be standing up here and sending bundles of reports, of from ten to forty in number, and having the Clerk read those reports to the House. To prevent that will save time, and that much will be accomplished.

Mr. MCMILLIN. The course that you suggest was pursued in the last Congress, and that body sat here until the 1st of October, as the gentleman well knows.

Mr. ENLOE. Oh, it sat here a great deal of that time trying to give me an opportunity to address the House. [Laughter.]

Mr. MCMILLIN. And the gentleman, if I remember correctly, when he got an opportunity to address the House, addressed it against the innovations that he is now lauding.

Mr. ENLOE. Against the innovations that were wrong; not against the innovations that were right.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that I am heartily in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ENLOE]. I believe it is in the interest of good government, and such a rule as this House ought to adopt for the proper and decent dispatch of business. I know that from the committees of which I have the honor to be a member many reports are made by myself and my colleagues, but I have never thought it necessary that I should rise and address the Chair and obtain recognition simply to say, "Mr. Speaker, I present the following report," and then to have the report read by title and the reading not listened to by anybody in the House. [Laughter.] I think the better practice would be, as suggested by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ENLOE], to let the reports be presented, as was done during the Fifty-first Congress. Indeed, I congratulate by friend from Tennessee upon the fact that he is taking a step forward; that he is getting himself worked up to the idea of attending to business and preventing unnecessary waste of the time of the House. I repeat, Mr. Speaker, I am heartily in favor of the adoption of his amendment and shall vote for it.

The question was taken on the amendment of Mr. ENLOE; and the Speaker pro tempore [Mr. SPRINGER] announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. ENLOE. I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 94, noes 72.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Let us have the yeas and nays, Mr. Speaker.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MCCREARY. Will the Chair be kind enough to state the question?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ENLOE], which the Clerk will read.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to state to the House the number of private reports made in the last Congress.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that argument is not in order after the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. BURROWS. It is not, if objection is made.

Mr. MCMILLIN. The yeas and nays have been ordered and I call for the regular order.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 170, nays 74, not voting 87; as follows:

The following additional pair was announced:

Mr. HARE with Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR, for the rest of the day.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the next rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

RULE XIV.

OF DECORUM AND DEBATE.

1. When any member desires to speak or deliver any matter to the House, he shall rise and respectfully address himself to "Mr. Speaker," and, on being recognized, may address the House from any place on the floor or from the Clerk's desk, and shall confine himself to the question under debate, avoiding personalities.

2. When two or more members rise at once, the Speaker shall name the member who is first to speak; and no member shall occupy more than one hour in debate on any question in the House or in the committee, except as further provided in this rule.

3. The member reporting the measure under consideration from a committee may open and close, where general debate has been had thereon; and if it shall extend beyond one day, he shall be entitled to one hour to close, notwithstanding he may have used an hour in opening.

4. If any member, in speaking or otherwise, transgress the rules of the House, the Speaker shall, or any member may, call him to order, in which case he shall immediately sit down, unless permitted, on motion of another member, to explain, and the House shall, if appealed to, decide on the case without debate; if the decision is in favor of the member called to order, he shall be at liberty to proceed, but not otherwise; and, if the case require it, he shall be liable to censure or such punishment as the House may deem proper.

5. If a member is called to order for words spoken in debate, the member calling him to order shall indicate the words excepted to, and they shall be taken down in writing at the Clerk's desk and read aloud to the House; but he shall not be held to answer, nor be subject to the censure of the House therefor, if further debate or other business has intervened.

6. No member shall speak more than once to the same question without leave of the House, unless he be the mover, proposer, or introducer of the matter pending, in which case he shall be permitted to speak in reply, but not until every member choosing to speak shall have spoken.

7. While the Speaker is putting a question or addressing the House no member shall walk out of or across the Hall, nor, when a member is speaking, pass between him and the Chair; and during the session of the House no member shall wear his hat, or remain by the Clerk's desk during the call of the roll or the counting of ballots, or smoke upon the floor of the House; and the Sergeant-at-Arms and Doorkeeper are charged with the strict enforcement of this clause.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend Rule XIV, sections 2 and 3, by inserting "half an hour" wherever the words "one hour" occur in said sections.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, there are a great many good talkers in this House, and this is a pretty extensive body, and it strikes me that it is very desirable that upon every important occasion we should hear the views of gentlemen who have had large experience in this Hall. It certainly gives me personally a great deal of pleasure to hear the views of gentlemen who have been here for several years, and I think it is advantageous to new members generally, as aiding them to form correct ideas upon the various subjects presented to us.

But, Mr. Speaker, in order to secure this result in the fullest measure, it is desirable that we should hear the views, not merely of a few, but of many of the members of this House. It has been said that there is wisdom in a multitude of counsel, and I think that saying applies to this case. Now, if an hour is permitted to open and close, and if members occupy that time, necessarily only a few men comparatively can be heard. In fact, as gentlemen will remember, our time so far has been taken up here by a very few men in discussing the subjects that have come before this body. I, for one, would like to hear a general expression from all the members of the House, or as general an expression as we can get. We ought to bear in mind we have been here now for two months and that we are being criticised by the mouth pieces of public opinion, the newspapers, on the ground that we have not been so industrious as we ought to have been, and have not done all that we should have done in the interest of the public service. It is said that we should have devoted ourselves to business instead of occupying the time with speeches and frequent adjournments. Now, it is to save the time of the House, which would otherwise be taken up by unnecessarily long speeches, that I have offered this amendment.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. MILLER, it was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

2. In the absence of a quorum, fifteen members, including the Speaker, if there is one, shall be authorized to compel the attendance of absent members, and in all calls of the House the names of the members shall be called by the Clerk, and the absentees noted; the doors shall then be closed, and those for whom no sufficient excuse is made may, by order of a majority of those present, be sent for and arrested, wherever they may be found, by officers to be appointed by the Sergeant-at-Arms for that purpose, and their attendance secured; and the House shall determine upon what condition they shall be discharged.

Members who voluntarily appear shall, unless the House otherwise direct, be immediately admitted to the Hall of the House, and they shall report their names to the Clerk to be entered upon the Journal as present.

Mr. BURROWS. I move to amend by adding to the clause just read the paragraph which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

3. On the demand of any member, or at the suggestion of the Speaker before the second roll call is entered upon, the names of members sufficient to make a quorum in the Hall of the House who do not vote, shall be noted by the Clerk and recorded in the Journal, and reported to the Speaker with the names of the members voting, and be counted and announced in determining the presence of a quorum to do business.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Speaker, this proposition has been pretty thoroughly debated, and I do not care to prolong the discussion; but I wish to take the sense of the House on the proposition.

Mr. ALDERSON. Mr. Speaker, is an amendment to this proposition in order?

The SPEAKER. An amendment to the amendment is in order.

Mr. ALDERSON. I move then to add at the end of the proposed amendment this language: "But in no case shall the hat or coat or umbrella of a member in the cloakroom be counted." [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BOUTELLE. I suppose that is differentiating the value of membership on the other side.

Mr. REED. I desire to be heard on that amendment. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine will proceed.

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, the amendment just proposed by the gentleman on the other side shows very clearly the kind of mind which has been at work upon this subject. I noticed with very great regret that my colleague on the Committee on Rules [Mr. CATCHINGS], while entirely willing to believe—upon my personal assurance, I presume—that no person was counted simply because his hat was present, had nevertheless to tell the story, because he was really reluctant to give up the idea, it had so fastened itself upon his mind. This is another survival of that idea.

My own impression is that the officers of this House elected by any party are quite capable of honestly carrying out the rules of the House as they understand them; and it seems to me it would be a great mistake for us in our proceedings to omit to take notice of what I think is the constitutional requirement with reference to a quorum. In other words, I desire to call the attention of the House to what seems to me to be a fact, that if this House has a majority of its members actually present, it is then and there constituted a body to do business, that it has not itself any right to obscure that fact, or to refuse to admit it, or to decline to take any reasonable method for ascertaining it.

Of course, if any gentleman sincerely believes it to be necessary that every member of the quorum should participate in the business, then, of course, it is his duty to stand by the ancient methods. But if he believes, as I do, that the presence of a majority of the members constitutes a quorum, then I do not think he has any right to refuse to recognize that fact and take the proper means for ascertaining it. Now, the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] proposes to ascertain that. As this proposition has had the sanction of every court to which the question has been presented, I think it ought to have the sanction of the House of Representatives.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman who offered the amendment to my amendment is entirely sincere in his proposition, I trust he will renew it when we reach, on the next page, clause 2 of Rule XVII, where it is provided—

A call of the House shall not be in order after the previous question is ordered, unless it shall appear upon an actual count by the Speaker that a quorum is not present.

At that point the gentleman's amendment providing that no hat, or coat, or umbrella shall be counted under such circumstances would be very appropriate. The Committee on Rules have already provided for the counting of a quorum by the Speaker after the previous question is ordered, and to propose the amendment which the gentleman has offered is simply to cast reflection upon the Committee on Rules.

Now, as has been very properly said, the Constitution of the United States provides that a majority of the members of this House shall constitute a quorum. How that quorum is to be ascertained is not declared; but no one can deny for one moment that so soon as the presence of a quorum is discovered in this body—I do not care how it is ascertained—that moment the body has legislative capacity.

I have offered this amendment for the purpose of facilitating business. Two or three times already during this session the question of no quorum has been made in this House when there was a quorum present, and a roll call has been forced which might have been avoided by simply adopting the provision embraced in my amendment (which corresponds with the provision embraced in the very next proposed rule reported by the Committee), that the Speaker shall count the quorum.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, it is not my purpose to detain the House at any length in the discussion of this amendment, but in view of the statement just made by the gentleman from Maine, I desire to read his views in respect to a quorum as expressed in debate on this floor in 1880. The gentleman from Maine at that time said:

> The constitutional idea of a quorum is not the presence of a majority of all the members of the House, but a majority of the members present and participating in the business of the House.

Mr. REED. I am sure the gentleman from Missouri will read the whole sentence and not a part of it.

Mr. DOCKERY. I have not the whole of it at hand or I would do so with pleasure. I am quoting the gentleman as his remarks appear in some observations I made during the last session.

Mr. REED. Then I ask the gentleman to read the whole sentence.

Mr. DOCKERY. I will read the remainder of it.

Mr. REED. Read the beginning of it.

Mr. DOCKERY (reading).

> It is not the visible presence of members, but their judgment and votes the Constitution calls for.

Mr. REED. Read the beginning of it.

Mr. DOCKERY. I have not the beginning or it would afford me pleasure to comply with the request of the gentleman from Maine.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I understand that the opinion of the gentleman from Maine I have just quoted was the opinion he entertained in 1880, and my purpose is simply to show that he has materially changed his views in respect to this question.

Mr. ALDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I make no issue with the gentleman from Maine in his suggestion that the officers of this House are faithful, and that they will do their work honestly and well. But, sir, it will not be disputed that during the sessions of the Fifty-first Congress, when the gentleman from Maine himself presided over this body as its Speaker, gentlemen who were downstairs in bath tubs, and gentlemen who were down street and not present at all, were counted to make up a quorum, in order that the Republican majority might be able to carry out what it desired to accomplish against the wishes and the will of the people expressed upon the subject before such action was taken.

There were numerous cases which might be cited of a character similar to that which I shall now state if there had been opportunity given to members here to make personal explanation on the floor of the House. Take the case of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FORMAN], who was counted as present when not here at all—not even in the city. The record states it as true. It stands there on the record uncontradicted, that he was counted here on one occasion to make a quorum when he was not even in the District of Columbia, but was at home in his own State.

Mr. REED. To what gentleman do you allude?

Mr. ALDERSON. To Mr. FORMAN.

Mr. REED. I remember the incident.

Mr. ALDERSON. I am not here, sir, to say that hats and umbrellas and overshoes and coats were counted during the sessions of the Fifty-first Congress in order to make up quorums; but I am here to say that empty seats were counted time and again in order that quorums might be constituted. I am here to say that the records of the Fifty-first Congress show that gentlemen not present were counted as present, and were not even permitted subsequently to have the privilege of stating in the RECORD that they were not present.

I understand that the gentleman now presiding over the deliberations of this body was once counted as present when he was not in the Capitol, but was in his own room at the Metropolitan Hotel.

So far as are concerned the remarks made by the gentleman to the effect that my amendment is a reflection upon the Committee on Rules of this body, I state now and to this House that there has been no such purpose, that no reflection was intended, nor is any such reflection made. I will say, however, Mr. Speaker, in so far as I may be permitted under the rules to say it, that I have intended this motion for amendment as a reflection upon the doings and acts and utterances, the arbitrary will and power as it was exercised by the Speaker of the last House of Representatives [applause on the Democratic side] and his Republican brethren who stood at his back and accorded him always their support in his actions.

The people of this country, Mr. Speaker, have passed upon this question, and the people of this country have said by an overwhelming majority that they will have no counting of quorums as was done in the Fifty-first Congress. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, to the general declamation which is made I do not purpose to make any reply. To that kind no reply can be made, from the very nature of the case. But wherever specific statement is made I do purpose to make reply to that.

The specific statement which has just been made here is that Mr. FORMAN of Illinois arose in the House and stated that he was counted as a part of a quorum when he was in Illinois. That statement is correct. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Payson], then a member, was occupying the chair, and he made an error in the count. Now, there is no method of counting a vote or the presence of a member which is not liable to error and mistake; and there have been repeated instances under the rules of this House by which the votes of members were recorded when they did not vote, and also where they have been recorded upon the opposite side to which they did vote; and, unlike the case of Mr. FORMAN, which made no difference whatever, there being a quorum present without him, some of those instances absolutely changed the effect of votes of the House.

There are two instances, which I have already stated in public prints, which I have found in the RECORD myself, where by the RECORD, years before the Fifty-first Congress was in existence, it is shown that there was an error made which absolutely changed the whole vote. I remember that Mr. Plaisted, from my own State, declared that he had come down to the front and repeatedly voted in one way, and his statement was supported by the statements of members of the House, and yet the Clerk of that Democratic House—and it might have been the Clerk of a Republican House as well—had recorded him the other way; and accordingly the Speaker declared the vote to be void. Now, those errors have happened under any and every system. They are simply mistakes of the kind which exist and are common to human nature. They are not to be charged to the method of counting a quorum which has been in vogue in parliaments ever since a parliament was invented.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, the Constitution of the United States provides that in certain cases, when demanded by one-fifth of the members present, a roll call shall be taken. If the gentleman means anything by his argument, he means that this constitutional provision itself might be abolished. There would be no necessity for it if the Speaker can count a quorum in the way specified. There is some meaning to that provision of the Constitution, intended for a certain purpose, a purpose to have a roll call and a record made, not by the Speaker, but by the members themselves in answering to that roll call; and there is a distinction between the count by the Speaker and the count contemplated by the Constitution of the United States. It is that each member shall make his own record.

There may be some mistake made, it is true, but the Constitution requiring it, is it not by the sense of this House and of the country admitted that the record on roll calls, when each member present makes answer one way or the other, or refuses, as he chooses, that record so made up by the member on the floor is the record that ought to go to the country? Is not a safer record made upon a roll call when each member of this House has the right to answer to his name when it is called, when his answer is taken down by the Clerk, when that vote is recapitulated in the presence of the House? Is it not more likely to be an accurate record than one that is made simply by the Speaker casting his eye over the House and counting, or sending out in the cloakrooms to ascertain the presence of members?

Now, what the courts may decide is not the question here. If the courts should say that we have a right to make rules for our own government and to ascertain what a quorum shall be, or how that quorum shall be ascertained, that is one thing. The next question is, what is the safest rule to adopt for this House? What is the honest rule? What is the safe rule for the government of this House and to secure the integrity of its proceedings and its legislation? I say the safest rule is that we shall have a roll call to show that there is a quorum, upon the answer of gentlemen who are present to answer to that roll call, and who are responsible to their constituents whether they answer or not. That being the safest rule, and under the Constitution we having power to adopt rules, I say that, independent of any constitutional provision with regard to it, we ought to adopt a rule requiring a roll call in order to ascertain when a quorum is present, provided that point is made and insisted upon.

[Mr. WHEELER of Alabama addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, it is very easy to suggest untruthfulness and dishonor upon the part of any gentleman who may be elected to serve this House either as Speaker or in any other office. I submit that authority must rest somewhere. I submit further, Mr. Speaker, that where authority has been vested, from the origin of parliamentary assemblies down to the present time, wherever there is a record of such authority the action upon the part of the Speaker and the means of ascertaining a quorum have been in one direction and uniform. It is not becoming to say that it is not safe to trust the Speaker of this House with the authority which every presiding officer has over every body in this country outside of this and a few legislative assemblies that have followed the example of this House.

Mr. Speaker, I challenge any man in this House to find a scintilla of authority outside of the record of this House for any authority or any means of discovering whether a quorum is present in any legislative body, in any board of directors, in any corporation whatever, in any Legislative Assembly, except upon a count of the Speaker. In the rules we are called upon to adopt to-day, in the very first rule, it is provided that—

1. The Speaker shall take the chair on every legislative day precisely at the hour to which the House shall have adjourned at the last sitting, immediately call the members to order, and on the appearance of a quorum, etc.

There is no way of his determining whether a quorum is present, whether he is justified in taking the chair, or whether the fifteen are present, by whose authority a call of the House can be taken, except by the count of the Speaker; and as the gentleman from Wisconsin has called attention to it, section 2 of Rule XVII also provides for a count by the Speaker.

Jefferson's Manual provides that—

Any member may call for the House to be counted.

It is the only provision for discovering a quorum, that is in Jefferson's Manual from the beginning of the Government. In Cushing's Manual, page 97, paragraph 253 reads as follows:

In some of the ways above mentioned.

Having described the ways and the provision of how a quorum shall be constituted, it goes on to say—

The quorum of each Legislative Assembly becomes established as a fixed number; the presence or absence of which can always be ascertained by counting. This is usually done, after the assembly is constituted, by its presiding officer, who announces or reports the result.

Furthermore, paragraph 260 reads:

When the number necessary to constitute a quorum is fixed absolutely, as in Massachusetts, it is only necessary to count the members present in order to ascertain whether the requisite number is in attendance.

Now, I have only one other remark to offer, in reference to this amendment to the rules, and that is, that it is remarkable that it should be necessary to offer such an amendment. The practice which this amendment is designed to correct was inaugurated in this House because a minority of the States and of the people were guarantied under the Constitution an institution in part of the States which was thought to be endangered by the majority of this House; and this system was inaugurated, contrary to the practice of all parliamentary assemblies in the world, to protect human slavery, and has lingered to the present time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, it has been stated several times in the newspapers of the country, and was stated also, I believe, by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] a few days ago, that I had on a former occasion, in the House, approved the method of counting a quorum which was adopted by the Fifty-first Congress. The facts, so far as my record on that point is concerned, grew out of the discussion in the Forty-sixth Congress of an amendment offered to the rules at that time by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Tucker].

Mr. Tucker offered the following as an independent rule:

2. Whenever a quorum fails to vote on any question, and objection is made for that cause, there shall be a call of the House, and the yeas and nays on the pending question shall at the same time be ordered. The Clerk shall call the roll, and each member as he answers to his name, or is brought before the House under the proceedings of the call of the House, shall vote on the pending question. If those voting on the question and those who are present and decline to vote shall together make a majority of the House, the Speaker shall declare that a quorum is constituted; and the pending question shall be decided as the majority of those voting shall appear.

It will be seen from this proposed rule that a call of the House was to be ordered when a quorum failed to appear, and if members did not answer under the call, proceedings were to be instituted to bring absentees to the bar of the House, and, when they appeared there, the question as to whether they should be excused or not for their absence was to be presented and passed upon by the House. Under the rule, their presence was to be ascertained by the call, and they were to be personally brought to the bar of the House. In discussing that rule I made these remarks, showing the interpretation which was then put upon the rule by me:

One of the greatest absurdities imaginable to me is this: it is within the power of a less number of members than a quorum of this House to issue a mandate and send it to the Pacific coast, to the far-off State of Oregon, to bring in a member to this body, and when we have got him here at an expense of weeks of time and thousands of dollars, the man is not here at last unless he voluntarily opens his mouth and says "I am here"—and votes "ay" or "no" on the pending question. I say there can be no greater absurdity than to presume our fathers made a constitution and gave that power to a less number than a quorum, and after we have exhausted it the man was not here at last unless he chose to be. He did not choose to be here or we would not have sent for him, and when he is brought here he is not here unless he chooses to be. What an absurdity.

That is what I said at that time, and it had reference to obtaining a quorum under an order for a call of the House, involving the arrest of absent members and the bringing of them to the bar of the House to have the question whether they should be excused or not determined.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] be allowed five minutes more.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. SPRINGER. I am obliged to the gentleman from Maine, but I shall not occupy all that time. I simply desire to add that the power here contemplated is an entirely different power from that which was conferred upon the Speaker by the rules of the last Congress to himself determine the personal presence of members. If this had been the rule in the last House there should have been none of those mistakes that did occur, because no member would have been recorded as present who had not been brought to the bar of the House and had his presence reported by an officer of the House, his excuse heard, and the question whether he should be excused or not determined by the House.

Mr. REED. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. SPRINGER. In one moment. But, Mr. Speaker, that rule having been offered and debated at some length, there was a consultation of members on both sides in regard to it, and it was then opposed by the Republicans. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Garfield] opposed it. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Conger], then one of the leaders of the Republican party, opposed it as unconstitutional. There was a Democratic majority here at that time and the Republicans were in the minority, and, after consultation upon both sides of the House, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Tucker] agreed to withdraw his proposition.

A difficulty was suggested to him which had not occurred to anybody during the debate, namely, that in performing our legislative duty under the provision of the Constitution which provides that the vote shall be taken by yeas and nays, there was but one mode of determining who were present and that was the official record of the yea and nay vote, and when that feature of the question was brought to the attention of the gentleman from Virginia he withdrew the proposition. It was not a feature of the rule that had been considered at the time of the debate, nor had the difficulty occurred to any member. There was, however, much reason in the proposition of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Tucker], and in fact, I believe it was entirely sound, except as to cases that might arise where a yea-and-nay vote is required by the Constitution.

Mr. REED. Then the gentleman from Illinois still believes that upon a vote that is not a yea and nay vote, if a quorum can be ascertained to be present, that constitutes the body to do business?

Mr. SPRINGER. I do, when it is ascertained in this way.

Mr. REED. Then, if this House should determine that the count should be made by the Speaker, in any case where there was not a yea and nay vote required, the gentleman would think the body constituted for business?

Mr. SPRINGER. That has been the practice.

Mr. REED. Counting by the Speaker?

Mr. SPRINGER. Yes; that has been the practice for many years where no yea and nay vote is required.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, until the last Congress it was, I believe, universally held that whenever the presence of a quorum on a yea-and-nay vote was raised resort must be had to the roll call to ascertain it. Without reading section 5 of the Constitution, which is so familiar, I invite attention to section 7, in relation to the action of the House where there has been a bill vetoed by the President, which section, in my judgment, aids in construing the clause to which I have referred. The provision is as follows:

Every bill which shall have passed the House of Representatives and the Senate shall, before it becomes a law, be presented to the President of the United States; if he approve he shall sign it, but if not he shall return it, with his objections, to that House in which it shall have originated, who shall enter the objections at large on their Journal, and proceed to reconsider it.

If, after such reconsideration, two-thirds of that House shall agree to pass the bill, it shall be sent, together with the objections, to the other House, by which it shall likewise be reconsidered, and if approved by two-thirds of that House it shall become a law. But in all such cases the votes of both Houses shall be determined by yeas and nays.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that this provision takes the question out of the domain of inference, by prescribing positively that there shall be no other way of taking the vote. It is a call of the yeas and nays that determines the whole question.

Mr. REED. What whole question?

Mr. BLOUNT. That determines the action of the House as to whether a bill is or is not passed.

Mr. REED. Does the gentleman think it determines the question of a quorum?

Mr. BLOUNT. I certainly do think it determines the question of a quorum. The only way by which the House can determine that matter at all is by a yea-and-nay vote.

But, sir, I am not concerned only about this constitutional question. I want the House to consider whether or not it is wise in this body to declare that the Speaker may count a quorum. We had some experience in the last Congress upon that question. The exigencies of the Republican party were great. Their majority was small. The passage of certain measures was contemplated and was actually consummated by the exercise on the part of the Speaker of this unprecedented power of counting a quorum. In that way were passed measures which to my mind were extremely dangerous, and which in my judgment have been repudiated by the country. It was thought at the time that the action of the members of the then minority of the House in leaving it would not meet the approval of the country. The distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. WALKER) had a picture of the House of Representatives taken on a certain occasion, illustrating it, and that picture was sent to the country. The opinion of the country can perhaps be ascertained in the results of the election.

There was presented here in the last Congress a proposition which in my judgment radically changed our whole institutions, destroying the power of the States in the matter of electing Representatives to this body. It was necessary——

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BLOUNT. I hope I may be allowed two or three minutes more.

Mr. WALKER. I move to extend the gentleman's time for so long as he may desire.

Mr. BLOUNT. I do not want a great deal of time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MCCREARY). If there be no objection the gentleman from Georgia will proceed for five minutes longer.

There was no objection.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, in order to consummate the measure to which I have referred it was deemed necessary by the party then in control here to adopt orders in that House which prevented that body from debating or amending the measure. A few amendments were allowed; but the proceeding was merely a travesty on the right to amend. Some little debate was permitted; but it was only a travesty on debate. Then after the use of methods like this, the power on the part of the Speaker to count a quorum was utilized and the measure passed this body, and but for the conservatism of the Senate our institutions as understood by our fathers would be to-day a wreck.

In the presence of an example like this—upon a review also of the methods adopted for the passage of the McKinley bill in regard to which debate and amendment were restrained beyond everything that had been witnessed before—in view of all the action which in the stress of extreme party exigency was adopted by the majority at that time, I ask whether when we recall the history of the operation of this power on the part of the Speaker—I will not undertake to say whether he counted fairly or unfairly—is it possible that this House can entertain for a single moment a proposition which would put the Democratic party here on record as declaring that at the expense of the constitutional powers of this House, this prerogative shall be transferred to any Speaker.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. RAINES addressed the Chair.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Mr. Speaker, I think we have had enough debate on this question.

Mr. OATES (to Mr. CATCHINGS). It was understood I was to have five minutes upon the question.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Very well; I will yield to any gentleman who may wish to speak, but I was going to suggest that we come to a vote.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York [Mr. RAINES] addressed the Chair and will be recognized.

Mr. RAINES. Mr. Speaker, on most questions this House is perfectly willing to trust the count of the Speaker; but when it comes to the question of declaring a quorum on a yea-and-nay vote, there seems to be objection; and it seems to be assumed that in such a case a member can quietly filibuster by refusing to vote, and so break a quorum. The last House, Mr. Speaker, took issue with that position, and by its rules prevented such a proceeding. But contrary to what has been stated by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] that was not the first time that this thing had been done.

The first gentleman to bring to the notice of the public the propriety of the presiding officer counting a quorum was the prospective candidate of the Democratic party for the Presidency—the late governor of the State of New York—Mr. Hill, who, as presiding officer of the senate of that State, said to certain members of that body: "You can not sit in your seats and break a quorum; while you sit there I will count you." He led the way in which the Republican party of the last House followed. That is one question upon which we know exactly where David B. Hill stands. You may be at sea as to how he stands on the silver question, or the tariff question, but upon the question of the right of the presiding officer of a legislative body to count a quorum, you know exactly where he is.

Another reason that has been advanced why the Speaker should not be permitted to count a quorum is that such a proceeding may impair the accuracy of the count. Now, I admit it is a little easier to be accurate in regard to the count of a quorum on a roll call than it is when you have to catch the members "on the fly," so to speak. But even the roll call is not always accurate.

Why, Mr. Speaker, only on Saturday last I find my name recorded as voting in the negative on a question put to the House on which there was a roll call taken, when, as a matter of fact, on Saturday I was not in the Capitol at all.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Oh, what an outrage.

Mr. REED. In this session?

Mr. RAINES. In this session.

Mr. BOUTELLE. What an invasion of the rights of the citizen! [Laughter.]

Mr. RAINES. That is only one illustration. But what is worse than that, or at least almost as bad, I find on another occasion, I am recorded as having moved that the House adjourn, a motion which I never have made in the House, which I never shall make for the purpose of interrupting the delightful harmony which exists on the other side of the House.

Now, Mr. Speaker, for one I believe the precedent set by Governor Hill was a good one, and that in following it in the last House of Representatives we followed a proper precedent, although it is the only thing I am disposed to give him credit for in the whole course of his political career. [Applause on the Republican side.]

[Mr. OATES addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. PENDLETON. Mr. Speaker, naturally I am not very fond of this business of counting quorums, as I believe that I once had to travel out of the House rather unceremoniously, by virtue of the Speaker's exercise of that power; so that it may be easily surmised that I am not in favor of any rule that will authorize the Speaker to count one. Those who have been here but a short time, myself included, can observe the mistakes that are made almost every day by the Speaker's count. You nearly always distrust the Speaker's count, when there is a call for a division and a vote is taken. Then you have the yeas and nays, and there never has been a time in my recollection when the yeas and nays did not reveal a different vote from the count that was made by the Speaker on the division.

That alone, I should think, would prove to the House that it was highly important that no such power as this should be intrusted to the Speaker. And if the majority had not intrusted power of that character to the Speaker in the last House, Democratic members can well recount the evils that would have been avoided. When our Republican friends assembled here they found that they had a majority of only eight; and with that majority they could not have placed upon our statute books a single measure of Republican legislation. Upon the force bill there were Republicans in revolt, and that bill was passed because Democratic members, under this system of counting a quorum, had been turned out of this House by wholesale, and a larger Republican majority created, so that that bill might pass through the House.

If Speaker REED had not had the power of counting a quorum, the country would not be laboring under the inflictions and rascalities of the McKinley bill to-day. If the power of counting a quorum had not been granted, $1,048,000,000 would not have represented the expenditures of the Fifty-first Congress. And furthermore, gentlemen, if the power to count a quorum had not been granted by that House, half of the members upon the Republican side would not have lost their seats, and the former Speaker would probably be presiding to-day. So, while it did a great deal of good in this latter respect, it inflicted a vast amount of evil in other respects, which we do not care to repeat.

But if we look at this from another standpoint, if the smallest bill that we pass may have the yeas and nays demanded upon it, why should it not be that upon the important question of ascertaining whether there is a majority of this House present to do business upon that question, above and beyond all, the yeas and nays should be the highest test and the sole test, a count made by the members of the House themselves, a count which can be corrected easily enough the next day, if any mistakes be made, by the RECORD itself? Now, I do not approve of Governor Hill's method, wherein he imitates the Republican party, but I apprehend——

Mr. BOATNER. You make a mistake. The Republican party undertook to follow Governor Hill's example.

Mr. PENDLETON. Well, they followed a bad policy and a bad example in this regard, but I was about to say that I apprehend the constitution of the State of New York is a different document and a different instrument from the Constitution of the United States. I desire to submit to my friend from New York [Mr. RAINES] that if Governor Hill stands upon that platform, and if he stands upon other platforms that may be incorrect, still he stands upon one thing that my friend failed to mention, and that is, he stands upon the corpse of the Republican party in the State of New York. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Speaker, I propose to vote against this amendment. I propose to vote against it because I recognize the right of a majority to ascertain the existence of a quorum or perform any other function of the House in any method that seems to it proper. I agree with the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES], that if the House thought proper to ascertain the presence of a quorum by any method of counting that to it seemed proper, the constitutional power to do so is not doubtful.

Reference has been made by the gentleman from New York to the precedent that was made by Governor Hill in the senate of that State. The constitution of the State of New York requires a roll call upon the passage of every bill, and it requires that a majority of all the members elected to each House shall vote in favor of a measure before it can become a law. It also requires that in certain cases there must be three-fifths of the whole number of members present to give validity to a measure; and the filibustering which was attempted by the Republican members of the senate when Governor Hill as presiding officer counted a quorum consisted in their remaining silent so as to defeat that particular provision which required the presence of three-fifths. Governor Hill acted in obedience to elementary parliamentary law, holding that the right of the House to ascertain the presence of its own members was inherent in it, and he counted those present, submitting his action to the house; and the next day the State senate approved of his action, thus adopting it and making it the action of the senate itself.

Mr. OATES. Will the gentleman allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. COCKRAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. OATES. In the one case the constitution required that they should vote; in the other the requirement was that the two-thirds majority should be present.

Mr. COCKRAN. Undoubtedly, that was the difference.

Mr. REED. That was a quorum.

Mr. RAINES. Will the gentleman allow me to make a statement?

Mr. COCKRAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. RAINES. The constitution of the State of New York, as he has stated, required that on the passage of certain bills they should be passed by a majority vote, but that a certain number should also be present.

Mr. COCKRAN. Undoubtedly.

Mr. RAINES. Two-thirds on some bills and three-fifths on others. So here, in the passage of a bill, it is required that a majority shall be present, and we argue that that provision entitled the Speaker to declare, by means of a count, the presence of a majority, exactly as Governor Hill declared the presence of two-thirds by a count made by himself.

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Speaker, it was for the purpose of emphasizing that that I took the floor. It is to show the progress that Republican members are making. It is to show that the Republican party in adopting this principle has been forced to accept a standard set for it by a Democratic statesman. And it is because Democratic statesmanship has been vindicated by the attitude of the Republican minority here that I rise to acknowledge, on behalf of the Democratic party, the enlightened progress of the Republican machine. [Applause.]

Mr. RAINES. Then do not repudiate it.

Mr. COCKRAN. O, Mr. Speaker, I am repudiating nothing. The gentleman mistakes my attitude if he thinks it is one of repudiation. I am always glad to observe progress, even on the part of a minority whose principles have been repudiated by the people; and that leads me to say one word upon the powers of the House to count a quorum in any way that it may deem proper to adopt. Many of us, Mr. Speaker, were present in the Fiftieth Congress when a contest was made here against a gentleman who then occupied the chair, and who presided impartially, faithfully, and successfully over the deliberations of this House. The contest affected his right to be a member of this House. For five days, as I recollect, the business of the House was suspended by gentlemen on the Republican side sitting silent during the roll call, and at its conclusion raising the question of no quorum against the consideration of the report of the Committee on Elections which confirmed him in his seat.

I believe that then it was claimed that this right to secure exemption from the quorum by silence was the right of a minority; that it was a sacred and inherent right; that it was another of these extraordinary rights of minorities which you hear asserted in various expressions through the deliberations of this House. I would like to ask somebody on either side of this House to define these rights of a minority, which appear to be limitless in their scope. If the minority possess such extraordinary rights, who would be willing to remain in a majority, and how would the minority maintain its separate existence and the exclusive enjoyment of its mysterious privileges, when the whole membership of the House would be zealously contending for an opportunity to be enrolled among its numbers? Do not gentlemen see that the very moment they succeed in securing special privileges for the minority, that moment it would cease to be a minority? But as I understand parliamentary procedure, there can be neither a majority nor a minority on any proposition until a vote of the House has been taken and its sense ascertained. But the member who, though present in the House, attempts by silence to defeat a quorum, is filibustering to prevent the taking of a vote, and is therefore laboring to nullify the only procedure by which the existence of a minority can be ascertained.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. DOCKERY. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from New York be extended five minutes.

Mr. OATES. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from New York be extended.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri and the gentleman from Alabama? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. COCKRAN. Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to say one word in reply to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT]. He claims that because the Constitution provides that if the House decide to override the veto of a President the vote shall be taken by a call of the roll, therefore, when the House desires to ascertain the presence of a quorum it is bound to proceed in the same way. I confess I am unable to see the force of this reasoning.

Sir, it must be patent to everybody that when the provision allowing Congress to enact a law over the President's veto was incorporated in the Constitution the object of it was to limit the veto power as it then existed in the crown, a power by which, under the English constitution, the king could prevent all legislation by simply repeating the old formula, "Le roi s'en avisera." That was a power that had remained in "innocuous desuetude" since the time of William III, and had not been used for a hundred years when this provision was incorporated in the Constitution. When our Constitution was formed, when its framers came to consider the propriety of vesting the veto power in the Executive, they provided that it should have only partial existence in our scheme of government.

They provided that the veto might be interposed, but that the Legislature should have the power to override it. And they also provided that where a veto was overridden the vote of the House should be taken by yeas and nays, because they deemed it fitting that a certain solemnity should attend the exercise of the power by which the action of the Executive was overruled by the legislative branch of the Government. But surely it would be ridiculous to contend that the discharge by the House of an inherent function, such as the counting of its own members, is in any way analogous to the assertion of the supremacy of Congress over the Executive.

Where is the advantage of having a majority if a minority can by merely sitting silent in their seats defeat a quorum and prevent the majority from transacting business? It is absolutely essential to the existence of a parliamentary body that it possess the power to ascertain the presence of a quorum. That provision in our Constitution which permits one-fifth of the members present to demand a vote by yeas and nays was inserted in it in order to fix the responsibility of the representative to his constituency, and by making his proceedings public to stimulate him to greater industry in the public service and to hold him to a stricter loyalty to the House itself. It never was intended to enable any minority to arrest the proceedings of the House, to paralyze its action, and bring it into disrepute.

I confess, sir, that there have been errors in the count of the Speaker in the past, and therefore I recognize the force of the gentleman's statement that the Speaker's count is liable to error in the future.

There ought to be a rule by which we could properly determine the existence of a quorum. Some method of counting should be prescribed that can not be questioned, the accuracy of which can never be impeached. I think power should be lodged somewhere to bring a recalcitrant member before the House, either through the intervention of the Speaker or on the motion of any member, and to place him at the bar, and there, in the presence of the whole House, to note his presence and to count him as of the quorum.

Mr. Speaker, in the very nature of things this power must exist. Suppose a member were to leave this Hall; suppose he go to the farthest limit of this Union; you have the power to take him by force and compel his attendance here. You have a right to demand an explanation for his absence. You have the right to punish him. Is not that counting him? Is that not holding him to be present for one purpose? And if you can count him as present for one purpose can you not count him as present for another? If you hold he is present for disciplinary purposes, is he not present for all purposes?

The power to compel the attendance of members granted to you by the Constitution is different from the power to punish a member for absence or for any other disorder. When you exercise that power to compel attendance, when you bring the member here is it pretended that you can not count him, and if you can not count him as of the quorum how can you decide that he is present, how can you proceed either to punish him or discharge him? And can he sit here in his chair and remain in open contempt of the House, although, if he leave the House you can pursue him and again exercise the power to bring him back?

Sir, we must go back to the original principles of parliamentary government in order to decide what powers this House possesses and what powers it can enforce. No man familiar with parliamentary history can doubt that it has the power to count the members present at its sessions in whatever way it thinks proper, and that its judgment as to the method is binding upon the other departments of the Government. I will vote for the rule as it was reported from the Committee on Rules. I will support it, because it embodies the views of the majority as to the government of the House. But I do not desire to have it understood that if at any future time the House shall decide to count a quorum by any other method I shall be debarred by this vote of mine from supporting that other method, whatever it may be. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. ALDERSON].

Mr. ALDERSON. I withdraw that amendment, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The amendment of the gentleman from West Virginia is withdrawn, and the question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS].

Mr. REED. Upon that I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. REILLY. I ask that the amendment be again reported.

The amendment was again read.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Mr. Speaker, pending the roll call I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) adjourned.

JOHN G. WILLIAMS.

Mr. DANIEL. I present the petition of John G. Williams, administrator de bonis non of Col. Francis Taylor, of Orange County, Va., praying for relief.

A few days ago I introduced a bill (S. 1863) for the relief of John G. Williams, administrator de bonis non of Col. Francis Taylor, of the Virginia Line on Continental establishment of the war of the Revolution, to accomplish the purpose set forth in this petition and had it referred to the Committee on Claims. I think the more proper reference of the bill would be to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, and I ask leave to withdraw the bill from the Committee on Claims and that it be referred with the petition I now present to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be withdrawn, and referred with the petition to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. DAVIS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 331) to provide for the settlement of accounts and claims in certain cases, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 99) to provide for the settlement of accounts and claims in certain cases, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. GALLINGER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 370) granting an increase of pension to James H. Osgood, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 371) granting a pension to John Chamberlain, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. PROCTOR, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 620) to amend an act entitled "An act to promote the administration of justice in the Army," approved October 1, 1890, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. STEWART, from the Committee on Mines and Mining, to whom was referred the bill (S. 54) to amend chapter 6, of Title XXXII, of the Revised Statutes, relating to mineral lands and mining resources, reported it with amendments.

Mr. DAWES, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 839) granting a right of way to the Jamestown and Northern Railway Company through the Devils Lake Indian Reservation, in the State of North Dakota, reported it without amendment.

Mr. FRYE, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1663) for the relief of the sufferers by the wreck of the United States revenue cutter Gallatin off the coast of Massachusetts, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill (S. 2001) for the relief of the sufferers by the wreck of the United States revenue cutter Gallatin off the coast of Massachusetts; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. FRYE. I present a letter from the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury to accompany the bill as a partial report.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The paper will be so filed.

REVISED SENATE MANUAL FOR 1892.

Mr. MANDERSON. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing to report back favorably the resolution for printing the Revised Senate Manual for 1892, and I ask for its present consideration. After the resolution is read I shall offer an amendment to it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution, submitted by Mr. ALDRICH January 11, 1892, as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the Senate, under the direction of the Committee on Rules, 1,500 copies of the Revised Senate Manual for 1892, with corrections to January 1, 1892.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. MANDERSON. In the third line of the resolution I move to strike out "1,500" and insert "830;" so as to read:

Eight hundred and thirty copies of the Revised Senate Manual.

I do this for the reason that that is the number which can be printed for $500, which is within the limit.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER BRIDGE AT SOUTH ST. PAUL.

Mr. WASHBURN. From the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably, without amendment, the bill (H. R. 217) to amend an act entitled "An act for the construction of a railroad and wagon bridge across the Mississippi River at South St. Paul, Minn.," approved April 26, 1890. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be read for information.

Mr. WASHBURN. I will simply state that it is the amendment of an act passed in the last Congress for the construction of a bridge at South St. Paul, changing the location from one section to another and extending the time. The bill has passed the other House, and the report of the House committee accompanies the bill with the confirmation of the War Department. As the time expires very shortly, it is desirable that the bill shall be passed promptly.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read the bill, and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

Mr. WASHBURN. I ask for the reading of the report of the House committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The report will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Mr. LIND, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, submitted the following report (to accompany H. R. 217):

The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 217) to amend an act entitled "An act for the construction of a railroad and wagon bridge across the Mississippi River at South St. Paul, Minn.," approved April 26, 1890, submit the following report:

The only effect of this amendment is to extend the time for the commencement and completion of the bridge authorized by the act, and to change its location from points in section 10 to section 2 in the same town and range, less than 1 mile.

The United States Engineer Department reports that there is no objection to the passage of the bill.

Your committee therefore recommends that it do pass.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SENATOR FROM IDAHO.

Mr. MITCHELL. In the matter of the contest initiated by Mr. William H. Clagett, involving a right to a seat in the Senate for the full term commencing March 4, 1891, now occupied by Senator Fred. T. Dubois, the Committee on Privileges and Elections have instructed me to submit a report. Accompanying the report, as a part of it, I am instructed to present two resolutions, numbered respectively 1 and 2, and to recommend their adoption.

I ask that the report and the resolutions may lie on the table for the present and that they be printed. I ask, however, that the resolutions be read at this time, and I give notice that at a very early date I shall call the matter up for consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolutions will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolutions, as follows:

1. Resolved, That Fred. T. Dubois is entitled to retain the seat he now holds as Senator from the State of Idaho for the full term commencing March 4, 1891.

2. Resolved, That William H. Clagett is not entitled to be admitted to a seat in the Senate from the State of Idaho for the term commencing March 4, A. D. 1891.

Mr. VANCE. I wish to have the resolutions lie on the table for a day or two, as there will be a minority report submitted as to the right of Mr. Dubois to the seat.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is satisfactory; and I ask when the views of the minority are submitted that they be printed in connection with the report of the committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered.

Mr. PALMER. I ask that the joint resolution lie upon the table, as I propose at some convenient day to address the Senate on the subject.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will lie on the table.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. PROCTOR, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers in the case of Mary A. Sands be taken from the files of the Secretary of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

On motion of Mr. TELLER, it was Ordered, That Mrs. Mary Jewett Telford have leave to withdraw the papers filed by her with the Committee on Pensions.

PRINTING OF INTERNATIONAL MARINE CONFERENCE BILL AND REPORT.

Mr. FRYE. I ask for the present consideration of the order which I send to the desk.

The order was read, as follows:

Ordered, That there be printed for the use of the Senate 300 additional copies of Senate bill 1755, to amend certain sections of Title LII of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and to carry into effect certain recommendations of the United States delegates to the International Marine Conference, and the report accompanying the same.

Mr. FRYE. I will simply say that the number printed before has been entirely exhausted.

Mr. MANDERSON. The proposed order includes not only the bill, but the report?

Mr. FRYE. It includes the bill and report.

Mr. MANDERSON. Is the Senator aware whether the cost will be less than $500?

Mr. FRYE. It will surely be less than $500, I should think.

Mr. MANDERSON. I have no objection to the order, except that I feared it might infringe the law.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, I hope that the Senate will indulge me a few moments in a matter personal to myself. I ask the Chief Clerk to read the matter marked in the Philadelphia Press of last Saturday, which I send to the desk. Read the headlines and the matter that is there marked.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The matter will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

[Philadelphia Press, Saturday, January 30, 1892.]

WASHINGTON—THE SENATE WASTING TIME IN OBEDIENCE TO SENATORIAL COURTESY—MR. VOORHEES FAILS TO SUSTAIN HIS CHARGES—HIS SCHEME TO DEFEAT JUDGE WOODS'S NOMINATION NOT SUPPORTED BY THE REPUBLICANS HE HAD COUNTED UPON.

[Special dispatch to the Press.]

WASHINGTON, January 29.

The Senate Judiciary Committee wasted another session to-day, out of "Senatorial courtesy" to Senator VOORHEES of Indiana. The time was taken up in the examination of witnesses brought on here from the Hoosier State to prove that Judge Woods, nominated by President Harrison for the circuit bench, was a scoundrel because he had sent Sim Coy, the Democratic heeler and repeater, to prison, and had not sustained trumped-up charges against Col. W. W. Dudley. Not a single fact was proven. "Senatorial courtesy" was again exercised by adjourning until Monday, without action, in order that VOORHEES may have two more witnesses here. It is not at all certain that the witnesses will be here, but it is tolerably certain that if they do come they will have nothing to add to the useless testimony of those already examined.

The committee will undoubtedly take up their judicial nominations on Monday and report them favorably. Not a Republican will vote against the confirmation of Judge Woods. The opposition of Senators VOORHEES and TURPIE has been a mere farce, and illustrates to what ridiculous lengths that indefinite quality, "Senatorial courtesy," will go. A whole month has been wasted simply because VOORHEES was not in the city, and it would have been contrary to "Senatorial courtesy" to consider the case until he got back. Witnesses were summoned whose fees and mileage will amount to about $600.

The attempt of Senator VOORHEES to form a coalition with the Republicans was a flat failure. He knew that some of the Republicans like QUAY, CAMERON, and HIGGINS were opposed to the nomination of George M. Dallas, and he made the proposition that if these disgruntled Republicans would induce enough of their party to aid the Democrats in defeating Judge Woods's nomination, the Democrats would reciprocate and aid in defeating Dallas. The plan would not work, however, and it is now reasonably certain that all the nominations will be confirmed next Monday without a dissenting vote among the Republicans.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, on the subject of the Senatorial courtesy which prevails in this body I have nothing to say, and nothing need be said. Senatorial courtesy, sneered at by blackguards and scurrilous people, is simply, I believe, the decencies of life which obtain among gentlemen. Some of this courtesy has been extended to me by the Committee on the Judiciary, for which I make my profound acknowledgments, but for not more than a week or ten days at the outside.

I have nothing either at this time to say about the case of Judge Woods. It is still under investigation; witnesses are yet to be examined; and how this newspaper man knows what the decision of that committee will be passes my understanding.

My principal object, however, in having the article read to which we have listened relates to the last paragraph. In the last paragraph the statement is made explicitly and unqualifiedly that I made a proposition to certain Senators, naming Senator QUAY of Pennsylvania, Senator CAMERON of the same State, and Senator HIGGINS of Delaware, that for their assistance in the defeat of the confirmation of Judge Woods, now here as an appointee for one of the United States circuit judgeships, I was in favor of joining in a movement on this side of the Chamber to defeat Judge Dallas, of Philadelphia.

A grosser lie than this statement would hardly be possible for his satanic majesty to conceive. Such a word or thought or suggestion, of course, has never emanated from my lips. On the contrary, bad as I think the appointment of Judge Woods, improper and unfit as I conceive and know him to be for a judicial position, I would feel myself dishonored and disgraced beyond redemption to receive a suggestion, let alone to make one, to defeat an honest, upright, and competent man like Judge Dallas for the sake of getting clear of him.

If there are Senators in this body, those named or anybody else, who can say they have ever heard from me a single suggestion or thought of such a corrupt combination, I want that statement to be made now. If I were capable of making such a suggestion I should be a proper subject for expulsion from this body; and the miserable falsifier and scoundrel who makes such an accusation from that gallery ought to be expelled from the privileges of the Senate.

I call the attention of the Committee on Rules to this as one of the most flagrant outrages that have occurred in the long years that I have been a member of this body. I shall offer no resolution on the subject, for it is personal to myself, but it does create a question in every mind of how long and how much we are to stand of this kind of business.

I see that some men were yesterday put in prison by a court in a neighboring State for libeling a member of this body, and if the same rule and with the same severity were put in operation against a correspondent capable of concocting and publishing such a calumny as we have here, it would be better for public morals and better for the decencies and order of this country.

I simply wanted to brand this miserable creation of a dishonest heart and brain as I have, and with that I am done.

Mr. CAMERON. Mr. President, I had not read the article in the Philadelphia Press, for I scarcely ever read that paper, but I can say that, so far as my name is connected with it, it is a lie from beginning to end. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] never spoke to me upon the subject of the judgeship or as to the confirmation of Judge Woods or as to the rejection of Mr. Dallas.

Mr. QUAY. I desire merely to add to what my colleague has said my own statement of the absolute falsity of the charge made in relation to the alleged combination said to have been made between the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] and the Senators from Pennsylvania. It is utterly false and without any foundation. I have never heard of such a suggestion from the Senator from Indiana.

Instead of the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] and myself being willing or ready to enter into a combination of that kind, the fact is that we are both in favor, as I always have been in favor, of confirming the nomination of Mr. Dallas as judge.

Mr. HIGGINS. As disclaimers seem to be in order, Mr. President, I feel bound to say that there is no truth in the statement which has been read and no justification for its publication. I never heard a word from the Senator from Indiana or his colleague or any member of this body respecting any such subject whatever.

Mr. WILSON. I wish to say in behalf of the Committee on the Judiciary, which has been referred to, that in its treatment of this case it has not departed in any way from its usual conservative course, and it will not depart therefrom. The case will be treated as it should be without disguising anything concerning the subject-matter thereof, and a report will be made in due time.

Any reflections that may be cast upon that committee divulging any feature of the case, I think are wholly without foundation. The case will be reported in due time after the conservative order of procedure shall have brought the committee to a conclusion, and that is only delayed by the fact that some parties who were requested to appear before the committee were absent from the city and time had to be given in order for them to appear; but there has been no departure from the orderly course pursued by that committee in this case more than any other that it has to deal with.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT GRAND FORKS, N. DAK.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The morning business having been concluded, the first case on the Calendar will be stated.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I call for the consideration of Order of Business 54 on the Calendar, which was passed over yesterday without prejudice, being the bill (S. 591) to provide for the erection of a public building in the city of Grand Forks, N. Dak.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill having been passed over without prejudice is now in order.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with an amendment, in line 13, before the word "thousand," to strike out the words "and fifty;" so as to make the appropriation $100,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. I see there is no report accompanying the bill, and I should like to have some explanation of the necessity of a public building at that place.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Mr. President, the bill reported from the committee was passed at the last session of Congress by the Senate, and again reported by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds at this session of Congress. There is a United States district court held at Grand Forks, N. Dak., and they are paying at the present time about $3,500 rent for court purposes. There is also at the city of Grand Forks a United States land office, for which a considerable rent is being paid. I believe that the Government is also paying $1,200 per year for post-office purposes there. Altogether the amount of rent which the Government is now paying for Federal purposes in that city is equal to at least 5 per cent of the amount asked for in this bill.

The only difficulty with the bill is that the appropriation is not large enough. It ought to be $250,000 instead of $100,000.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FOOD AND DRUG ADULTERATION.

The bill (S. 1) for preventing the adulteration and misbranding of food and drugs, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. PADDOCK. I ask that that bill be laid aside without prejudice, retaining its place on the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over without prejudice, retaining its place.

EZRA S. HAVENS.

The bill (S. 2) for the relief of Ezra S. Havens was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides for the payment to Ezra S. Havens, late captain of Company G, Eighteenth Regiment Missouri Volunteer Infantry, of the pay and allowances of a captain of infantry in the late volunteer service from the 11th of March, 1862, to the 2d of February, 1863.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NAPOLEON B. GIDDINGS.

The bill (S. 3) for the relief of Napoleon B. Giddings was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to direct the Secretary of War to cause to be investigated the circumstances of the alleged taking from Napoleon B. Giddings, in January, 1847, at Santa Fé, N. Mex., and depositing with A. B. Dyer, lieutenant of ordnance, United States Army, by order of Sterling Price, colonel commanding the army in New Mexico at that time, of 140 kegs of gunpowder, and to ascertain and determine the reasonable market value of the powder at that time and place, and whether the same, or any part thereof, was ever returned or delivered back to Giddings, and the final disposition of the powder; and if the same, or any part thereof, was never returned to or delivered back to Giddings, then to certify to the Secretary of the Treasury the amount of the reasonable market value at that time and place of the powder so never returned or delivered back to Giddings; and the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to cause to be paid to Giddings the amount so certified by the Secretary of War to be the reasonable market value of such powder.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ALFRED J. WORCESTER.

The bill (S. 4) for the relief of Alfred J. Worcester was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to direct the Secretary of War to correct the muster roll of Alfred J. Worcester so as to show him to have been the first lieutenant of Company G, Fourteenth Regiment of Illinois Volunteers, from December 23, 1863, to June 11, 1864, and the Secretary of the Treasury is directed to pay him the pay and allowances of first lieutenant of that company from December 23, 1863, to June 11, 1864, deducting therefrom any and all sums of money paid to him during that period.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN S. NEET, JR.

The bill (S. 5) for the relief of John S. Neet, jr., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides for the payment to John S. Neet, jr., late a private in Company C, Third Regiment Missouri State Militia Cavalry, afterward Company L, Sixth Missouri State Militia Cavalry, of $100, in full payment of the sum allowed him in October, 1878, by the Third Auditor of the Treasury Department.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOSEPH W. CARMACK.

The bill (S. 6) for the relief of Joseph Carmack was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides for payment to Joseph W. Carmack, late of Company A, Sixth Missouri Cavalry, of the pay and allowances of a first sergeant of cavalry from May 1, 1862, to September 30, 1862, less any pay received by him during such period.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LOUISIANA STATE UNIVERSITY.

Mr. WHITE. I beg leave to call up Order of Business 25, being Senate bill 143, which was passed over without prejudice. It ranks on the Calendar with the bills now being acted on.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The title of the bill will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. 143) to increase the endowment of the Louisiana State University and Agricultural College, and for the Southern University of Louisiana.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill has been read at length and is before the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, and open to amendment.

Mr. WHITE. I offer as a substitute for this bill the bill included in Order of Business No. 158, being Senate bill 1610, which I reported a few days ago.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill last referred to by the Senator from Louisiana will be considered as the original bill in the absence of objection.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1610) to increase the endowment of the Louisiana State University and Agricultural and Mechanical College and for the Southern University of Louisiana.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Senate bill 143 on the same subject will be indefinitely postponed in the absence of objection.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT ALLENTOWN, PA.

The bill (S. 901) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon, at Allentown, in the State of Pennsylvania, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. QUAY. My attention was diverted at the moment the last bill was passed. I move to reconsider the vote on its final passage.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The motion to reconsider will be regarded as agreed to if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

Mr. QUAY. I ask that the bill may go over for the present without prejudice.

Mr. COCKRELL. What is the motion, Mr. President? We did not hear it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. To reconsider the vote by which the Senate passed the bill (S. 901) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Allentown, in the State of Pennsylvania.

Mr. QUAY. I ask that the bill may be passed over without prejudice.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over without prejudice and retain its place on the Calendar, if there be no objection.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT FERNANDINA, FLA.

The bill (S. 408) to provide for the purchase of a site for and the erection of a public building at Fernandina, in the State of Florida, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to acquire, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, a site, and cause to be erected thereon a suitable building, including fireproof vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, elevators, and approaches, for the use and accommodation of the United States custom-house, post-office, and other Government offices, in the city of Fernandina and State of Florida, the cost of said site and building, including said vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, elevators, and approaches, complete, not to exceed the sum of $100,000.

Proposals for the sale of land suitable for said site shall be invited by public advertisement in one or more of the newspapers of said city of largest circulation for at least twenty days prior to the date specified in said advertisement for the opening of said proposals.

Proposals made in response to said advertisement shall be addressed and mailed to the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall then cause the said proposed sites, and such others as he may think proper to designate, to be examined in person by an agent of the Treasury Department, who shall make written report to said Secretary of the results of said examination, and of his recommendation thereon, and the reasons therefor, which shall be accompanied by the original proposals and all maps, plats, and statements which shall have come into his possession relating to said proposed sites.

If, upon consideration of said report and accompanying papers, the Secretary of the Treasury shall deem further investigation necessary, he may appoint a commission of not more than three persons, one of whom shall be an officer of the Treasury Department, which commission shall also examine the said proposed sites, and such others as the Secretary of the Treasury may designate, and grant such hearings in relation thereto as they shall deem necessary; and said commission shall, within thirty days after such examination, make to the Secretary of the Treasury written report of their conclusion in the premises, accompanied by all statements, maps, plats, or documents taken by or submitted to them, in like manner as hereinbefore provided in regard to the proceedings of said agent of the Treasury Department; and the Secretary of the Treasury shall thereupon finally determine the location of the building to be erected.

The compensation of said commissioners shall be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury, but the same shall not exceed $6 per day and actual traveling expenses: Provided, however, That the member of said commission appointed from the Treasury Department shall be paid only his actual traveling expenses.

No money shall be used for the purpose mentioned until a valid title to the site for said building shall be vested in the United States, nor until the State of Florida shall have ceded to the United States exclusive jurisdiction over the same, during the time the United States shall be or remain the owner thereof, for all purposes except the administration of the criminal laws of said State and the service of civil process therein.

The building shall be unexposed to danger from fire by an open space of at least 40 feet on each side, including streets and alleys.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHANDLER. I should like to ask the Senator from Florida, whom I see in his seat, to make a statement with reference to this bill, whether a building of the style specified and of this cost is required for the town of Fernandina in his State?

Mr. PASCO. Mr. President, this bill was before the Senate at the last session. It then received the recommendation of the proper officers of the Treasury. The report was published at the time, and the bill passed the Senate and went over to the House of Representatives, and was there slumbering at the close of the session. I think if the Senator from New Hampshire will read the report, which is on file, he will see that there is abundant necessity for this building.

Fernandina is the terminus of the Florida Central and Peninsular Railroad, and there is a large amount of phosphate business that is developed along the line of that railroad, and this is the terminus of that business. There is also a very large lumber business done there. It is the largest lumber port of the South Atlantic coast. The building is needed for post-office purposes, and also for custom-house purposes, and the other public offices that are usual in seaport cities.

I will say that the matter was carefully considered by the committee; the bill met the approval of the Department, and a similar bill at a previous session was passed by the Senate.

Mr. CHANDLER. I should like the Senator to state the population of Fernandina, and give us some information in relation to it.

Mr. PASCO. I do not think the population is over 5,000, but in my judgment and the judgment of the committee and of the Department that is not always the criterion by which these matters are to be judged. The necessity for a public building depends upon the demands of the public business rather than upon the population.

Fernandina is a point at which a very large amount of commerce has its outlet. It may be well for me to read briefly what is said in the committee's report as to the amount of business that is done there:

The custom-house business, according to the official statements submitted with the foregoing letter, is as follows:

From 1879 to 1889: Coastwise clearances, 2,452 vessels, 1,579,760 tonnage; foreign clearances, 656 vessels, 251,895 tonnage.

In 1879: Coastwise clearances, vessels 298, tonnage 181,075; foreign clearances, vessels 91, tonnage 29,776; total vessels 389, tonnage 210,851.

The business of Fernandina is now about to be greatly increased by the development of the phosphate industry, large deposits of which mineral have been found in the State of Florida during the past twelve or fifteen months, and some of it has already sought an outlet through this harbor. It is confidently expected that a large proportion of it will be exported hence to home ports in other States and to foreign countries. And the shipping which goes there for cargoes will increase the importations and add largely to the business and customs receipts of the port.

This report was made a year ago and the expectations with reference to the phosphate business have been fully realized. I will state that 54,271 tons of phosphate have been shipped through this port during the past year, and it is estimated that it will be increased to 100,000 tons during the present year.

I have recently been in Fernandina, and everything indicates the enterprise of the people and the prosperity and the continued development of the resources and business of the city and the section of which it is the outlet.

I think the necessities of the place fully require a building of this character to be erected.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read "A bill to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Fernandina, in the State of Florida."

F. F. WHITE.

The bill (S. 1030) for the relief of F. F. White was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides for the payment to F. F. White, of Philadelphia, Pa., the sum of $530 for his house at Juneau, Alaska, taken by the United States Government for military purposes.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to call the attention of the Senate to the report in this case, and I desire to call the attention particularly of the Senator making the report, the Senator from Washington [Mr. ALLEN]. This is to pay, the bill says, $530 for a house in Juneau, Alaska, that was taken by military authority.

I have read over the report, and I can not see that any military authority took it. Some of the United States officers there took it, and they do not claim to have had any authority about it. In the report of C. S. Johnson, United States district attorney, I find this language:

From all the facts I believe the parties ought to be given their respective houses, and as Henning suggests, they could, without injury to the Government, be permitted to occupy the reservation until such time as the Government had use for it.

Now, why not give these parties their property there? There has been no formal reservation of this land. It has not been done, as I understand it, by any Department or military commander, nor has it been done by the President; but a few officers who were up there claimed that this square ought to be reserved. It is true they have in the United States courts dispossessed these parties, but we have the power to reverse them so far as restoring the land is concerned, and why not give all these parties their land, because this is only the entering wedge and you will have to pay every one of them. I do not know how many there are, but there are quite a number of others, and it seems to me the better way would be for us to pass a law requiring this property to be delivered back to the respective claimants. That would end the matter and keep us from paying for a whole parcel of buildings that may be of no earthly benefit in the world.

Mr. ALLEN. In answer to the Senator from Missouri, I will say this: I think there is very little danger of a precedent being established by this bill, for the reason that the entire ground in controversy is only a block in the city of Juneau about 300 feet square.

The reason why the bill was reported in this way was that this party had gone to the little town of Juneau along with others and attempted to comply with the custom or usage there prevailing of entering lots and making an actual occupancy of them under a proceeding analagous to that under the town-site act. He had taken a lot in the block, built a residence for himself and family, of three rooms, fitting up the house, in a very cozy manner for that country, at the actual cost stated in this bill. Shortly after taking his family into his house as a place of residence, without any apparent authority for it at all, proceedings were instituted against him as a trespasser upon the public lands of the United States. A claim was put forward that this was a military reservation, or that it was reserved for that purpose. There was no legal foundation for that claim. Ejectment proceedings were instituted against him in the court. The Attorney-General directed the action suspended, attempted to control it, but, notwithstanding the direction from the Attorney-General's office, the action went forward to judgment.

It was said this man could interpose no defense whatever, because he was upon the land as a trespasser, the land laws of the United States not having been extended over Alaska. It was also said that he had no redress by way of appeal, because the amount involved did not equal $5,000. Although the proper Department of the Government attempted and gave the direct command that these proceedings should terminate, as I say, they went forward, judgment was entered, and the party was ousted, and property was taken possession of by the collector of customs for Alaska.

After thus taking possession of the property, the Government used it and has continued to use it as a common prison or jail for the prisoners of the United States who were arrested and held there in confinement to be transported to Sitka.

The man's condition was entirely changed by this conduct of the Government. He was thrown out of his house, which was destroyed for the purposes of a residence by reason of this use to which it was put by the Government through its officer, having taken possession of it as he did, and it was practically destroyed for the purposes of a residence. This man's entire situation was changed, and it would not be doing him justice in any sense of the term, or even approximately doing him justice, to return him the possession of his premises after they had thus been degraded by the use to which they were placed.

Therefore it is considered nothing more than just and equitable that the party be paid for this house which has been confiscated and taken away from him and converted by the Government into a common prison.

Mr. COCKRELL. It is remarkable, Mr. President, that the court should have decided as they did in this case. Here is the history of a so-called military reservation; this is from the present United States district attorney, as I understand, who makes this report.

You ask me to give you—

This is to C. S. Johnson—

You ask me to give you such information at my command which may tend to clear up the disturbing question (at Juneau, Alaska) "of military reservation or not."

In order to make the matter plain I must go back some years. In October, 1880, gold was first discovered in the locality and vicinity where now is situated the town of Juneau (formerly called Rockwell, Alaska). In the month of December following many miners came from Sitka, Fort Wrangel, and other points to this place. The United States steamer Jamestown, Henry Glass, commander, was stationed at Sitka, Alaska. Commander Glass and many of his officers, with some of their marines, also came here from Sitka at the time of the "gold stampede." The officers at once interested themselves in the new discoveries and decided to camp here.

As you will see, by referring to the annexed certified copies of record, Commander Glass, on May 2, 1881, wrote out a "notice of reservation," reserving for garrison purposes lots 1, 2, and 3, in block 7—

After the town had been laid out, after the settlers had gone there and laid out the streets and blocks, then this officer comes and writes out a little notice, and calls it a reservation—reserving for garrison purposes lots 1, 2, and 3, in block 7; but for some reason the notice was never posted on the ground, nor was it recorded here in the recorder's office until May 23, 1885.

Four years afterwards—on said 23d day of May, 1885, H. E. Nichols, lieutenant-commander, United States Navy, made an additional record of this so-called military reservation, claiming for the Government all of block 7 in the town of Juneau, Alaska, excepting lots 4, 5, and 6, that is to say, lots 1, 2, 3, 7, and 8 of said block 7.

The public had no notice of a reservation claimed by the Government, and no one here knows of any expenditure upon said reservation made by the Government. * * *

The most claimed by any one settler upon the tract of land in question is 50 by 100 feet. The parties residing upon this tract of land entered upon it in good faith, erected their cabins, as is customary on the frontier, for the purpose of residing therein. They expended their money in good faith, believing in the established policy of the Government to, in all cases, protect the interests of the early settlers on the frontier.

* * * * * * *

The settlers referred to are all good, law-abiding citizens. They attempted to establish their claims in Judge Keatly's court in suits brought against them by your predecessor, Whit. M. Grant, formerly United States district attorney; but Judge Keatly would not allow the cases to come to a question of fact, but ruled that, since the land laws of the United States had not been extended over the district of Alaska, they were all trespassers; the amount involved in each case being less than $5,000 no appeal would lie, and the consequence is that their homes were taken away from them without, I might say, a hearing.

In other words, the United States court in Alaska determined that a United States officer can dispossess any man from any piece of land he is on, regardless of his buildings or anything else. Is this monstrosity to be approved by the action of the Senate? Is this proceeding to be confirmed by sustaining such a bill as this? Why, Mr. President, I think no such case has ever occurred in the history of this Government from its foundation.

The case of Mr. Henning stands upon the same footing with the rest.

Now, you must remember that there are a number. There are the cases of Aaron Ware, Henry States, H. F. White, H. J. McDonald, W. J. Henning, and Lewis Nado, all these parties living upon the land and all having put their buildings there but States, and he is living in a Government building.

I do not think the tract of land in question in the first instance is large enough for a military reservation, being 150 by 150 feet in size; and then, again, it is a question if the Government desires to establish a military post here.

There, Mr. President, is the case. Now, why shall we confirm this outrageous proceeding and take away this property from this man? There is something back of this. This is not all of it. There is something back of it. A few officers attempting to reserve a block there after it has been laid out by the citizens of the town and they have taken possession and put their buildings on it without any law or authority, and they come into court and dispossess the owners of the property simply because there is no land law extended over that country and nobody has any right to the public land there. That is the principle of it. You can not take an appeal; and now we are to confirm that.

I say we ought not to pass this kind of a bill. This man ought to have reparation for the wrongful act in taking possession of his property, but we ought not by our action to confirm these unlawful acts and wipe them out. We ought to do justice to all of these parties, but we ought to let the people there know that the officers can not go there and kick a man off from any piece of land he has settled upon, although the general land laws of the United States are not extended over that country.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President——

Mr. FAULKNER. If the Senator from Washington will permit me I wish to ask the Senator from Missouri if he does not think that on the question of law the decision of the court was correct? In other words, were not these parties mere trespassers, as decided by the court, having no title to the land whatever; and erecting their buildings upon it when the property was recovered in an action of ejectment, of course the buildings went with it.

Mr. COCKRELL. No, Mr. President, I do not admit that. Where the land was public property of the United States and belonged to the masses of the people, an individual citizen it is true having a very small invisible right to go and settle upon it, I say that the common law of this country is that he has a better right than anybody else, and it has always been sanctioned, unless the Government takes the land for a reservation. It has been the practice of the Government from the foundation of it to recognize these rights. All that great Western country has been settled up in recognition of that priority of right. Here these parties go there as they have been doing from time immemorial, time whereof the mind of man runneth not to the contrary. They have been going and laying out town lots and locating upon them, and the Government has always confirmed them, and thereby recognized the inchoate right which they had. Here they have done the same thing. They have gone there, they have settled upon the land, they have laid the town out in lots and blocks, and they have taken possession of them; they have erected their buildings upon them. A naval officer comes along, a lieutenant, and sticks up a notice that he will reserve a certain one of these lots upon which these people had erected their buildings, and a United States officer comes in and brings suit against them, and the United States court say there is no land law extended over this country, and everybody is a trespasser, and so the court is a trespasser there just as much as these parties are, so far as that is concerned.

Mr. FAULKNER. The Senator from Missouri, I think, is admitting the whole proposition that I have suggested on which the committee acted, which was that the party was in law a trespasser and the fact that all of these former acts of individual settlers had to be confirmed in order to obtain the title by an act of Congress, simply demonstrates that the action of the court from a legal standpoint was correct.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I agree with almost every word the Senator from Missouri has uttered. It seems to me he has taken exactly the right view of the facts of this case throughout. It is only with his conclusions that I differ.

It seems to me that no greater outrage could have been perpetrated than was inflicted upon this man under the form or pretext of a legal suit. The Senator from Missouri does not too strongly state the case.

A man goes into a frontier community and conforms to custom, regulates his conduct by the course that controls other citizens, takes possession of a lot in good faith, and makes it his home, his place of abode. He is dispossessed of the land in the manner shown in the report, on the mere pretext that it was a military reservation, as shown by the Senator from Missouri—a high-handed piece of work. It was a gross outrage perpetrated in the name of law and against the protest of the Department of Justice. I would agree with the Senator from Missouri, if this party under the circumstances wanted to be placed back again in the possession of these premises he should be placed there; but when the outrage had been consummated, when his property had thus been confiscated and taken away from him, and after the Government of the United States has used it and used it to its ruin in making it a common jail for the criminals of that country, I say that when the man who has thus been the victim of abuse comes and asks that he be indemnified for his house, he ought not to be turned aside by the Senate of the United States.

This is his attitude. He says, "I have received this treatment, and being the victim of such conduct I now ask that I may be paid for this building which has cost me $530. It is no longer a home to me; it has no home association whatever to me; it is the common jail of this country. I do not want it again. It is ruined; it is valueless to me for the purposes for which I builded it, and I ask that the Government indemnify me by paying me the $530 which I expended in constructing it." It is not equitable or just when he comes and asks for this humble indemnity that it be withheld from him.

I fully agree, as I said, with every utterance of the Senator from Missouri as to this transaction. I only differ from him in the conclusion he has drawn. This is the choice of this man after having been placed in this position, and I hope the Senate will respect it.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator has stated the case properly so far as this individual is concerned, but we have the whole case in our hands now, and there are some others here, and are we to take up these cases one after another indefinitely and consider them? The whole subject is before us. We have got the facts. This man's property has been taken and converted to another use, and he ought to have compensation for it, the Senator says. Now, let us make the officers there understand that there is a power above them that will not permit them to trample upon the rights of the citizen who goes there. Let an amendment be made to this bill restoring these other lots. The whole matter is now within our jurisdiction.

Mr. ALLEN. I shall be very glad to accede to a proposition of that kind if the Senator pleases, but because three or four other persons have not asked for restitution I do not want this man to be deprived of it.

Mr. PLATT. Could not the Attorney-General direct that they shall be put back in possession of their lots?

Mr. COCKRELL. It seems the Attorney-General has not had the power yet to override the little naval officers there and the United States district judge. It seems he has been protesting against it as earnestly as he could, but he has not had the power to stop this infamous outrage.

Mr. ALLEN. If the Senator will pardon me, he will see that this particular man has gone away from Alaska.

Mr. COCKRELL. I understand that. It is perfectly right to make him compensation, but as this case is before us we ought to dispose of the whole matter, and not apparently confirm the unauthorized and outrageous actions of the officers there.

Mr. MITCHELL. May I ask what information the Senator has that the other parties claim any indemnity whatever?

Mr. COCKRELL. We know that they do.

Mr. MITCHELL. We have before us simply the report of the committee, and there is no one else than this claimant before us.

Mr. COCKRELL. Does the Senator suppose that any citizen of Oregon who has gone upon a piece of public land and made improvements and built a house would be kicked off by a United States officer without asking for anything? Has he got a constituent that would be so thick-skulled as that?

Mr. MITCHELL. I do not know what a constituent of mine might do, but I do know that the parties whom the Senator has referred to have made no application to Congress, so far as I am advised. Mr. White has made an application and has brought his case here. The Senator admits that the facts have been properly stated in the report of the committee submitted by the Senator from Washington [Mr. ALLEN]. Now, are we to hesitate and refuse to do what the Senator would seem to admit is an act of justice and equity to this man, and wait for somebody else to come in?

Mr. COCKRELL. No, do not let us wait at all. I do not want to have to drag in four or five other men in the same condition and have their cases brought up when the whole subject is here, every bit of it. There it is. It is just as much the case of the others as this. Now, let us require the officers there to do their duty and give up the land to the other owners if we have taken possession of it. In the other cases they will come in, but there is no evidence that they have done so. On the contrary, the whole case is stated in the report; one man has gone there and occupied a Government building.

> The others had erected their own houses. Suits were instituted and all were ousted except States. (The McDonald suit was dismissed upon your instructions.)

They have all been dismissed by the same process. This is only the forerunner to the others.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. White has applied, and the others have not.

Mr. COCKRELL. The others are bound to come in. They have built their houses and they have been kicked out. Are they going to submit? Are they going to permit Mr. White to get pay for his building and they ask for nothing?

Mr. MITCHELL. The most remarkable argument I have ever heard made in the Senate the Senator from Missouri is now making. He admits that the bill is correct as far as it goes; that it is correct so far as this individual claimant is concerned; and yet he refuses to have it adopted simply because three or four more other persons whom he believes to be in the same position are not here.

Mr. COCKRELL. They are here in the official record of the committee, and their claims will be made.

Mr. MITCHELL. They have never presented their bills to Congress and have never asked for any relief.

The Department of Justice says in regard to this case—Mr. Cotton, who represents the Department of Justice, after quoting what the United States attorney, Mr. Johnson, has said in regard to it, says this:

> The district attorney seems to agree that an injustice has been done to these parties, but that the decree of the court having become absolute, it is too late to have the same reopened. If this should be the case, is there any other relief except through Congress?
> I am, yours, very truly,
> JOHN B. COTTON.

There seems to be no question so far as this case is concerned that it is a very meritorious case and one in reference to which Congress ought to grant relief. It is a very small amount, some $500.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. President, I have not been able to get at the exact facts in this case and I have not had access to the report, but I should like a brief statement of the facts to be made.

Mr. MITCHELL. The Senator from Washington [Mr. ALLEN] made the report and will make the statement.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President——

Mr. WHITE. Will the Senator yield to me a moment?

Mr. ALLEN. Certainly.

Mr. WHITE. I call the attention of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] to the fact that this bill does not provide for adjusting the title to the land. The bill only provides to pay for buildings, and therefore this land is not brought into the category of the other persons to whom the Senator refers.

The controlling fact in the minds of the gentlemen of the committee was this: It appears as to this particular case that the man erected a building; when that land was taken possession of the authorities of the Territory took possession of that building, and are using it to-day for governmental purposes, and that is the only case of the kind, and the purpose of this bill solely is to pay for the building which is now being used for governmental purposes. This is the only case, as I understand, in that category, and therefore it seems to me it is taken out of the rule to which the Senator from Missouri refers.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am very sorry that my good friend from Louisiana [Mr. WHITE] is wholly mistaken about it. He has stated the case exactly, but unfortunately the record shows that the others are all in exactly the same condition as this man. Now let me read it. I call the attention of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. PALMER] to this fact. The Senator from Illinois will observe, on page 1 of the report of the committee, the report of the United States district attorney, in which he says:

> It seems that Aaron Ware, Henry States, F. F. White, H. J. McDonald, W. J. Henning, and Lewis Nado were living on the piece of ground claimed as a reservation. States was living in a house erected by the soldiers and owned by the Government, but he had made extensive additions to it. The others had erected their own houses. Suits were instituted and all were ousted except States. (The McDonald suit was dismissed upon your instructions.) The decree of the court was absolute and carried the buildings with the real estate. These buildings were placed in the hands of the collector and are now under his control.

Every one of them is in possession of the Government to-day and precisely in the same condition as this man's building. There is no evasion of it. There it is. It was one proceeding. They were all kicked out of their buildings, just as this man was, and every one except McDonald, whose suit was dismissed at the instance of the Attorney-General, stands exactly in the same situation as this man.

Mr. MITCHELL. Do I understand the Senator to favor the payment of this man or not?

Mr. COCKRELL. I want to pay him, yes, and I want to settle the claim against the owners and disavow this wrongful and outrageous act of the officers of the Government and recognize some right in an humble citizen in that Territory. That is the point I want.

Mr. MITCHELL. I understood the Senator from Missouri to have argued for a half hour together against paying the claim at all.

Mr. COCKRELL. Not at all. I am in favor of the disposal of all the cases, and not to have them acted upon by piecemeal. Here are these other parties whom the Senator from Louisiana will see are exactly in the condition of this man. They had their buildings as he had. The suits were instituted against him and them, and they were dispossessed under the same decree and the same United States officer taking possession of all their buildings.

Mr. WHITE. I beg the Senator's pardon. I do not think there is anything in the report as I read it that justifies the construction which he puts upon it. As I understand, the only building which has been taken and used by the Government as a jail is the building of this particular man, and in that respect the cases of the others differ toto cœlo from this one.

Mr. COCKRELL. How can you make that out? Here is the United States district attorney—the distinguished lawyer from Louisiana is, say, United States district attorney for Alaska, and is reporting to the Government what he has done in this case. He says:

> The others had erected their own houses. Suits were instituted and all were ousted except States. (The McDonald suit was dismissed upon your instructions.) The decree of the court was absolute and carried the buildings with the real estate. These buildings were placed in the hands of the collector and are now under his control.
> From all the facts I believe the parties ought to be given their respective houses, and, as Henning suggests, they could, without injury to the Government, be permitted to occupy the reservation until such time as the Government had use for it. But the decrees having been executed, and the buildings having passed into the hands of the collector—

There they are all of them having passed into the hands of the collector—

> I can think of no legal means by which either the court or attorney can give the claimants any relief.

Mr. MITCHELL. May I ask the Senator whether there is anything in the documents or whether he has any information on the subject showing the value of the improvements of these other parties?

Mr. COCKRELL. None at all.

Mr. MITCHELL. We have that information in full in reference to Mr. White's case.

Mr. COCKRELL. We can restore this property. If the others do not want it, we can take possession and convert it to our own use and pay them. I am tired of hearing that every man whom the United States Government has anything to do with has to employ a claim agent or attorney to prosecute proceedings against the United States when we have the facts before us in relation to the dealings between a citizen and our officials, and knowing what is justice in the case we are bound to see that justice is done without compelling the claimant to come in and at any expense prosecute a bill before Congress.

Here they are all in the same condition. Why not amend this bill so as to do justice to these parties and not apparently confirm and ratify these wrongful acts?

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). The Chair would remind the Senate that this proceeding is under Rule VIII, which limits debate to one argument on the part of each Senator, and to five minutes.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope we shall not enforce the rule at this late hour. If we do, I shall have to object to the bill, and I do not want to do that. I think we can settle it, and I desire to do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair simply calls attention to the rule. So far as this case is concerned, the present occupant of the chair will not enforce the rule, but so far as the Senate is proceeding under Rule VIII hereafter in respect to all other cases he will enforce the rule.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is all right. Nobody objects to that.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President——

Mr. DOLPH. If the Senator from Washington will permit me I should like to make an inquiry before he proceeds in this case.

I have had some correspondence with one of the parties interested in this so-called Government reservation, Mr. Henry States, who was a commissioner of the United States circuit court appointed from Oregon, the gentleman mentioned in this correspondence. He took a vacant house there, a small shanty which had been constructed by some soldiers stationed there, and repaired it and occupied it as a residence for himself and his family. It will be observed by the correspondence that he in common with others was evicted from his house on the ground that it was a Government reservation and as the United States land laws had not been extended over Alaska; these parties were mere trespassers or squatters on the land, but for some reason Mr. States has been allowed to occupy the property ever since and is now in occupation of it.

I do not know whether the committee understood or considered the fact that the last Congress passed a law in regard to Alaska which provided for the entry of town sites, and the people of Juneau and Sitka are now moving to secure title to tracts of land in Juneau and Sitka as town sites. Whenever a commissioner is appointed there to execute the law the question of title to all the town lots will of course come up before the commissioner, as their rights are provided for in the act extending the town-site law in a modified form over Alaska.

Mr. States has been recently in correspondence with me to see if I could not do something for him to get rid of the judgment of the Government which had been rendered to dispossess him. I should like to know whether it has been ascertained by the committee or whether it can be ascertained in this correspondence that this land is in reality a Government reservation.

Mr. COCKRELL. Unquestionably it is not.

Mr. DOLPH. And whether there has ever been any law or any action on the part of the Executive Departments to make to make it a Government reservation?

Mr. COCKRELL. As I understand, there has been no pretense of a legal reservation.

Mr. DOLPH. If not, whenever the town-site law is extended over Alaska and a commissioner is appointed, the parties will have a right to go before that commissioner to establish their claims. If it shall then appear that the Government is not the owner of this land, as this is not a military reservation, I should suppose that, notwithstanding the judgment of the court in regard to the possession of the land, the Government would fail and these parties would be entitled to take the title to the land under the grant for town-site purposes.

I merely make this suggestion so as to learn what the committee contemplate in regard these claims, and with a view to use that information to ascertain Mr. States's position and secure his title to his lot in case it is not a Government reservation.

Mr. MITCHELL. In this case I will show my colleague that Mr. White's house has been effectually destroyed by the use to which it has been put, namely, that of a jail, so that even should the land be restored to him the house, which is all he claims compensation for, would be of no use to him.

Mr. DOLPH. I understand that; but is there anything in all this testimony—I have not had time to read it all—which shows that this is a Government reservation, or whether it is not a mere claim by certain officers of the Government in the Territory?

Mr. ALLEN. I will answer the Senator from Oregon by stating that the only evidence we have of this being a military reservation was the act of the commandant of the ship who went to Juneau, in the spring of 1885, I think it was, and occupied this block and put some shanties and cabins upon it and remained until fall when he went away and abandoned the possession and never even complied with the local usage of filing any notice or claim upon it.

Mr. DOLPH. But was there not a judgment of a court?

Mr. ALLEN. The effect of that judgment was to absolutely and unconditionally oust all of these occupants as trespassers upon that land; so that from the time of the execution of the judgment until this time they have been dispossessed of their respective lots.

Mr. DOLPH. This bill proceeds upon the theory that they were wrongfully ousted?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes.

Mr. DOLPH. Would it not be a good idea now by legislation to set aside the effect of that judgment and allow these parties to present their claims with other citizens under the town-site law? Ought not that be a remedy to the other parties? Would not that be a good idea?

Mr. ALLEN. As far as I am concerned, I should be glad to see relief given to all these parties, but their claims have only come in incidentally as the claim of Mr. White has been dealt with. Whether these parties are in such a situation that they wish to go back and take possession of their lots, I do not know. Whether they will want to be paid for the buildings they have been deprived of, I do not know.

Mr. FRYE. Will the Senator yield to me for one moment?

Mr. ALLEN. I will.

Mr. FRYE. This Mr. White and his wife were formerly residents of my town and well known to me. When they were dispossessed of their house in Alaska they returned to the State of Maine, and the remedy which the Senator talks of would now be utterly useless to them.

The only objection made to this claim that I have ever heard is that there are others equally meritorious. I wish simply to say in relation to that, that when I learned from Mrs. White the condition of things I went to the Attorney-General's Department to see what remedy could be provided and found that they could provide none, but thought one ought to be provided by Congress. I sent for the necessary papers, introduced a bill, and had the bill referred to the Committee on Claims. The Committee on Claims have investigated and reported in favor of it, and I do not think now on any of these technicalities or sentimentalities that this woman should be deprived of compensation for her little property which has been taken by the Government.

Mr. ALLEN. The fact has been called to the attention of the Senate that this person is a resident of Philadelphia.

Mr. PALMER. I do not quite understand this matter. As I understand, White entered upon a public reservation, either knowingly or without knowing; he built a house; the United States Government has taken possession of it, and is now using it. Is there anything more in the case than that?

Mr. ALLEN. I think that is the case in a nutshell, except that there was no justification whatever for taking the house.

Mr. PALMER. It was the property of the United States and I suppose he was a squatter, as many men have been from the beginning of time in this country.

Mr. ALLEN. I will state to the Senator that the man was a squatter upon the land, in accordance with the known history of the settlement of the frontier. These people had gone to Juneau, had established a provisional government, and had established rules for the entrance of town lots precisely analagous to those under the town-site acts of the United States, and where the land laws are extended.

Mr. COCKRELL. They had laid the land off into town lots and blocks.

Mr. ALLEN. Yes; and the whole community were respecting each other's rights under that arrangement.

Mr. PALMER. As I understand the Senator from Missouri, his objection is not to paying this man, but it is because he thinks we ought to pay some other people besides.

Mr. COCKRELL. Oh, no.

Mr. FRYE. These people were removed, and the lots would not be worth anything to them, for they are back in the States.

Mr. COCKRELL. What I wish to do is to have the Government disavow the unlawful act of its officers. That should be done emphatically.

Mr. ALLEN. I hope the Senator from Missouri will not object to this person having justice done to him because the others are not included in the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. It does seem to me that it would strengthen the case and hasten final action upon the passage of the bill to put in the provision that the United States officers should restore the remaining lots in this block to the respective owners, those who built upon the land. That would be a very small matter. Then if they do not want the land, and we occupy it, we should have to adjust the compensation in an entirely different manner; but that would be a distinct disavowal of these wrongful acts. As we have converted this man's property to an entirely different use and destroyed its value largely for a residence hereafter, let us keep it and use it for Government purposes and turn back the land to the other parties.

Mr. ALLEN. I will suggest that the bill be passed over without prejudice, and if such an amendment can be attached to it I think no friend of the bill will object to it.

Mr. COCKRELL. I was going to suggest that as the hour of 2 o'clock has already arrived, practically the bill retains its place on the Calendar of unobjected cases.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill goes over without prejudice, retaining its place on the Calendar.

Mr. DOLPH subsequently said: I desire to present an amendment to the bill that was under discussion at 2 o'clock and went over. I ask to have it printed in the RECORD, so that when the bill comes up to-morrow it may be examined by Senators.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be so ordered without objection.

The amendment is as follows:

Add at the end of section 1 the following:

"That neither the judgments heretofore rendered for the possession of lots, at the time occupied by Aaron Ware, Henry States, F. F. White, H. J. McDonald, W. J. Hennings, and Lewis Nado, in the town of Juneau, in favor of the United States and against said parties, respectively, nor the execution thereof, shall bar or affect the respective rights of said parties to said lots under the provisions of an act extending the town-site laws of the United States to the district of Alaska, approved March 3, 1891, when the site of said town shall have been entered under said law or any amendment thereof, but the rights of said parties and of the United States to said lots shall be open to inquiry and determination upon application to enter such lots under said law."

PRINTING AND DISTRIBUTION OF DOCUMENTS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is the bill (S. 1549) providing for the public printing and binding, and the distribution of public documents.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. MANDERSON. I call the attention of the Chair to the fact that by unanimous consent of the Senate the bill was to be read by sections and the amendments of the committee were to be acted upon as they were reached in the reading of the bill.

Mr. PADDOCK. I ask the indulgence of my colleague for a moment while I give notice to the Senate that immediately after the conclusion of the consideration of the pending bill I shall move to take up the bill known as the pure-food bill.

Mr. CULLOM. I thought that was set for to-morrow.

Mr. PADDOCK. No, it has not been set.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The reading of the bill will proceed.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill and read from section 1 to section 17.

Mr. MANDERSON. Mr. President, this bill, so far as its first seventeen sections are concerned, relates entirely to the duties of the Joint Committee on Printing. They compose in very large degree the duties of that committee as they exist under the present law. The changes that have been made, while not very material, are, it is believed by the committee, very essential for the better performance of the duties of the committee. Experience has shown that the safeguards which have been thrown about the purchase of material for the Public Printing Office have been such as have produced very excellent results.

Mr. COCKRELL. What section is the Senator referring to now?

Mr. MANDERSON. I refer now to the first seventeen sections of the bill. If Senators who are interested in the subject will turn to the report of the committee they will find, commencing on page 428 of the bill as it is presented to the Senate, annotations to each section showing exactly what the existing law is and what changes are proposed.

The changes in the first seventeen sections, as I have said, are not very material. One is to make more definite and certain that control of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD which has so frequently been desired by members of this body. I make these suggestions simply because criticisms have been made elsewhere upon this and some other portions of the first seventeen sections of the bill.

It has frequently been suggested that there should be some method of editing the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD; that some plan should be devised by which that very voluminous document could be reduced in bulk. The committee, having that in consideration, thought that they could devise a plan, if the power was given to them, by which, without destroying the accuracy of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and without taking one syllable or one word from any speech delivered in either House of Congress, they could save a great deal of space by condensing much of the matter therein contained.

I shall not take the time of the Senate by going into that matter in detail, but will simply refer to page 416 of the report, where, in a letter prepared by Mr. White, one of the official reporters of the House, many suggestions are made that can be adopted by a rule or order of the Joint Committee on Printing if the power recognized in section 13 of the bill shall be granted to the committee by the passage of this proposed act. It is that the joint committee shall have control of the arrangement and style of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and while providing that it shall be substantially a verbatim report of proceedings that they shall take all needed action for the reduction of unnecessary bulk and shall provide for the publication of a semimonthly index. In the letter sent to the committee by Mr. White he shows some of the abuses of space in the RECORD, and he makes some very interesting calculations to show the vast amount of room taken up by that which is certainly unnecessary. For instance, one of the usual methods of reports is the following extract from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

Mr. KERNAN. I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Or as in the House of Representatives:

Mr. ANDERSON. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering bills upon the Private Calendar.

How very unnecessary this amount of room thus taken is! Far better form certainly would it be simply to say that on motion of Mr. KERNAN the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business, taking one line where four are now used, or, in the other House, on motion of Mr. ANDERSON the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering the Private Calendar. A calculation made by this gentleman, which will be found on page 418, says of the needless use of words in the RECORD:

As an illustration of this take the single item of "reconsideration," referred to on page 4, and apply it only to the bills and joint resolutions passed by the last Congress (and I refer now to House proceedings alone), and leaving entirely out of the count the thousands of times when this form is used with reference to simple motions, resolutions, or routine matters, or even amendments, and we find as follows:

Bills and joint resolutions which have actually become laws	2,189
Six lines of the RECORD to reconsideration of each	6
Giving a total number of lines of	13,134

or 131½ columns of the RECORD—

Needlessly used for this purpose. I might go on and call attention to other abuses of this character. It is to correct this sort of thing that the joint committee ask that they be given undoubted powers, not to mutilate the RECORD, not to cut from the speech of any man one word that he has delivered, but to so control the RECORD that such abuses can be hereafter prevented.

The only other important change with reference to the duties of the joint committee is to be found in section 17.

Mr. HALE. Let me ask the Senator a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. MANDERSON. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. Would this control and management of the RECORD be practically applied? Would some one member of the Committee on Printing have to look over every daily issue of the RECORD before it was printed?

Mr. MANDERSON. No, I think that could be reached by this method—in fact the joint committee have already this subject under consideration—to issue an order providing, for instance, that "in motions to reconsider and to table that motion," quite frequently used in the other House, "the wording shall be as follows," according to a form given. Take, for instance, the space that is devoted daily in the RECORD to the introduction of petitions. Very much room might be saved there by simply stating—the Joint Committee on Printing prescribing the form—"The following petitions were presented and referred: Mr. SHERMAN, petition in general terms as follows—referred to the Committee on Printing," or whatever committee.

Mr. HALE. Then the Senator's idea is that this could all be done under rules and general regulations, which would be followed by the employés of the Senate and House in making up the RECORD?

Mr. MANDERSON. Yes, in making up the RECORD. On page 795 of the DAILY RECORD of this session will be found rules for the publication of the RECORD heretofore prescribed by the Joint Committee on Printing, prescribing, for instance, as to the arrangement of the RECORD, that where the copy is received by the Public Printer in time so to do, the RECORD shall first show the Senate proceedings, to be followed by the House proceedings, so as to have an orderly arrangement. But the committee have felt that they have gone as far as their power authorized them to go in making rules of this character, and that in order to enter into this matter of the reform of the RECORD, so as to prevent abuse of space, some more definite authorization by law is required.

Section 17 is the only other section that makes any decided change in the duties of the joint committee, and it simply provides that when there is no Committee on Printing of the House of Representatives, the powers and duties which, under the law, devolve upon the Joint Committee on Printing shall be exercised and performed by the Senate Committee on Printing.

Mr. HALE. That will be during the vacation?

Mr. MANDERSON. It will be during the vacation or during the time which elapses at the commencement of every Congress between the first day of its session and when the committees are appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives. It is simply for the purpose of reaching a difficulty which now exists. There are many contracts that are provided to be approved by the Joint Committee on Printing, and that sort of work must stop during such intervals under the existing conditions.

The following sections of the bill up to section 54 pertain to the duties of the Public Printer, and where there are very material changes from the existing condition I will call the attention of the Senate to the fact.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will resume the reading of the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, wait one moment. Sections 13 and 14 authorize the joint committee to control the arrangement and style of the RECORD, etc., and the preparation of the index. That I understand is the existing law?

Mr. MANDERSON. It is almost the existing law, but if the Senator will compare the two he will find that this proposed law is a little more explicit in providing that they shall have control of the arrangement and style. The existing law is substantially that the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD shall be printed under the direction of the Joint Committee on Printing. It seems to be a very indefinite sort of power.

Mr. COCKRELL. Do I understand the Senator that the committee now recognize or feel that they have not the authority under existing law to make the changes which are referred to on pages 416, 417, 418, and 419 of the report? Have they not the power to make these changes without additional legislation?

Mr. MANDERSON. There has been doubt in the minds of the committee as to whether they could go so far as that. Each House, of course, controls its own record of proceedings, and under the existing condition I doubt very much whether an order issued by the Joint Committee on Printing with reference to the arrangement or the style of the RECORD would have controlling effect if either House should direct differently.

Mr. COCKRELL. I agree fully with the remarks made in this report and in giving the committee this authority, because I am satisfied that they can make many reductions in the space that the proceedings of the Senate and House occupy in the RECORD by abbreviating them, and yet omitting nothing that the law requires in the passage of a bill.

The purchase of material is a very important question. There are hundreds of thousands of dollars' worth, I suppose, that have to be purchased there every year. As I understand this provision, it takes that away from the Secretary of the Interior, practically, and gives it to the Joint Committee on Printing.

Mr. MANDERSON. The supervision of purchases?

Mr. COCKRELL. Yes.

Mr. MANDERSON. Oh, no.

Mr. COCKRELL. The paper?

Mr. MANDERSON. There is no change in that regard. The provision of the existing law is retained. For many years all paper used in the Public Printing Office has been purchased after advertisement in newspapers directed by the Joint Committee on Printing, and proposals received and bids opened under the direction of the Joint Committee on Printing. The duty of the Secretary of the Interior comes in during a vacation when Congress is not in session and there shall be failure to perform a contract.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is a point I refer to. When Congress is not in session has it not heretofore been the case that the Secretary of the Interior acted upon these contracts?

Mr. MANDERSON. Certainly, and it is so proposed now. There is no change proposed in that regard in the law.

Mr. COCKRELL. Is not section 17 a change of the law? It provides that—

At all times when there is no Committee on Printing of the House of Representatives the powers and duties under the law devolving upon the Joint Committee on Printing shall be exercised and performed by the Senate Committee on Printing.

That takes away the whole thing.

Mr. MANDERSON. That provision is to be taken in connection with other sections of the bill; for instance, section 9, which provides that—

If any contractor shall fail to comply with his contract, the Public Printer shall report such default to the Joint Committee on Printing, when Congress is in session, or to the Secretary of the Interior when Congress is not in session; and he shall, under the direction of the committee, or of the Secretary of the Interior, as the case may be, enter into a new contract with the lowest and best bidder for the interest of the Government among those whose proposals were rejected at the last opening of bids, or he shall advertise for new proposals, under the regulations hereinbefore stated; and during the interval which may thus occur he shall, under the direction of the Joint Committee on Printing, or of the Secretary of the Interior, purchase in open market, at the lowest market price, all paper necessary for the public printing.

So construing the two sections, section 9 and section 17 together, it is quite evident that both can stand. It certainly was not the intention of the committee to make any change in the existing law in that regard, and I do not think we have done so.

Mr. COCKRELL. The note to section 17, on page 430 of the committee's report, says:

This section is new, and is urged for the reason that the interests of the public service require the existence and action of a committee when there is no Committee on Printing on the part of the House; for example, during the time existing between the opening of Congress and the appointment of committees of the House.

Mr. MANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. COCKRELL. Taking the bill as it now stands, what would this Senate committee be able to do as and for the joint committee? It would practically be the joint committee during the vacation. Now, what jurisdiction would it have?

Mr. MANDERSON. It would have this jurisdiction, for instance: There is a provision in the existing law, and it is retained in the proposed law, that the Public Printer shall in all cases advertise for bids or proposals for lithographic work, but where the amount is small (I believe the limit is $200; that is my recollection) he can make his contracts without such advertisement, under the direction of the Joint Committee on Printing. There are other cases.

Mr. COCKRELL. It would be the Senate Committee on Printing, not the joint committee. The section says not the Joint Committee on Printing, but simply the Senate committee alone. The whole power would be exclusively in the Senate committee and not in the joint committee. Now, what has the Committee on Printing heretofore been doing in vacation practically?

Mr. MANDERSON. That has been one of the very embarrassing matters that have come to the notice of the committee. The committee, where the necessities of the public service have compelled, have acted as a joint committee, to have their action afterwards ratified by the joint committee when organized. That seems to have been necessary at times.

Mr. HALE. In matters touching both Houses?

Mr. MANDERSON. Yes, in matters touching both Houses. Here is the publication of some work that would cease because the necessary ratification or authorization by the joint committee to the Public Printer could not be had during vacation unless the Senate committee would to a certain extent usurp the power of a joint committee. There would be no joint committee in existence, but there is the Senate Committee on Printing, and the Public Printer has taken their authorization frequently in matters of emergency, that action to be afterwards ratified by the Joint Committee on Printing. It is to prevent just that sort of ignoring of the law that this change is proposed.

Mr. COCKRELL. Then the idea of this bill is that the Senate Committee on Printing will be in session all the time.

Mr. MANDERSON. Oh, not at all.

Mr. COCKRELL. They would have to be in session nearly the whole vacation if they had these powers.

Mr. MANDERSON. I call the attention of the Senator to the fact that I do not think he can recall any session of the Senate when the Committee on Printing have not been authorized to sit at their pleasure during the vacation of the Senate.

Mr. COCKRELL. I know that has been the custom.

Mr. MANDERSON. That has always been the custom, so that the committee could be called together for the purpose of performing their work.

Mr. COCKRELL. But practically how often has the committee been called together as a committee?

Mr. MANDERSON. Very seldom, indeed.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is what I wanted to get at.

Mr. CULLOM. I should like to make an inquiry of the Senator, though not exactly as to the bill before the Senate. Knowing that the Senator is familiar with the rule as well as the law, I should like to ascertain whether there is any joint rule or statute which requires the Committee on Printing to be a joint committee. I see the rule provides for "a Committee on Printing, to consist of three Senators, which shall have power to act jointly with the same committee of the House of Representatives," simply authorizing it to act with that committee, I suppose, if it chooses to do so. This question was brought to my attention upon a suggestion of an increase of the membership of the Committee on Printing, and I should like to have the Senator state whether there is any law which controls the appointment of this committee, making it a joint committee, so that any action taken by the Senate in reference to it would have to be acted upon also by the other House.

Mr. MANDERSON. If the Senator will turn to section 3756 of the Revised Statutes of 1878, he will find that the law for many years has absolutely required that there should be a Joint Committee on Printing, composed of three members of the Senate and three members of the House of Representatives. We do not change this law at all, except that we strike from it the provision that the Joint Committee on Printing shall be appointed by the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House. That is in the existing law, and we strike those words out of the bill before us for the reason that it did not seem to be necessary that we should state how these committees should be appointed. They are appointed under the rules of their respective bodies.

Mr. CULLOM. That information is what I desired. I had not looked up the statute, and I desired to know whether it was a statutory provision or whether it was a mere rule of the Senate.

Mr. MANDERSON. I might say that the only other change from section 3756 of the Revised Statutes is that we strike out the word "public," and we follow that all through the bill, making it now a Joint Committee on Printing instead of a Joint Committee on Public Printing, which is the language of the old law.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The reading of the bill will proceed.

The Secretary read sections 18, 19, and 20.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to have some explanation of section 20. That last seems to be a new section.

Mr. MANDERSON. It was considered very proper legislation by the committee, so that Congress might have some knowledge of the extent and character of the printing done upon requisitions of the Departments.

Mr. COCKRELL. Do they make no report of that now? Is there no record of what is done now under the law?

Mr. MANDERSON. No, except what is found in the Public Printer's report, which is frequently extremely vague, and he makes it in detail or not at his pleasure. Sometimes it has been made, and sometimes it has not been made; and we feel that the provision of law should require that in his annual report he should specify in detail concerning the departmental printing. The advantage will be that we shall not only see how the appropriations made for the departmental printing have been used, but it will also give to members of Congress a list of books of all sorts that issue from the Departments and frequently do not come to Congress at all.

The latter part of the section is simply that we may have some idea by the report of the Public Printer as to what books are bound on requisition for members of Congress. It has been called to the attention of the committee that sometimes there has been gross abuse in the binding of books for members of Congress. The law as it exists, and we propose its reënactment, is that any member may have bound at the Public Printing Office for his personal use one copy of any document to which he is entitled; that is to say, books that come to him, that are printed during his term of office. He may have these bound for his private use. It was thought well that we should have some report from the Public Printer as to what books were bound and the cost therof.

Mr. COCKRELL. Would that interefere, for example, with this case: A Senator wants to make a volume of separate publications of the Government on a kindred subject—small documents, reports, and things of that kind—and have his own label put upon the back of it, or an indication of what its contents are. Would this prevent that from being done?

Mr. MANDERSON. I do not think it would in the least. I do not see how it would.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask because some of the most valuable books a Senator can get for his own use are composed of various reports gotten together and put into one book, so that he will have them in a form where he can refer to them readily instead of having them bound separately in half a dozen different books.

Mr. MANDERSON. Certainly this section would not interfere with that.

Mr. COCKRELL. Another thing I have been looking over in this bill. The question is, can a committee have bound for each member of the committee a copy of all the reports made by that committee? It was for years, and I presume it is now, the custom of the Committee on Claims to have bound for each Senator on the committee all the reports made at a session of Congress. It has been the case ever since the Forty-fourth or the Forty-fifth Congress to have all the Military Committee reports bound. I believe we commenced it in the Forty-fourth or Forty-fifth Congress, and now all the reports made by all the members of that committee are bound at the end of each session and each Senator on the committee is furnished with a copy of the record. It is the only way we can understand what the committee is doing and utilize the labor at one session of what was done at a preceding session. It is very important that we should have that privilege.

Mr. MANDERSON. It is not proposed to interfere with that in the least degree. When we get further on in the bill the Senator will find a section to which I shall propose an amendment that will reach that very proposition. If, when we come to it, the language should not be considered such as will warrant that sort of binding, it can very easily be changed so as to meet his views.

Mr. HAWLEY. My colleague on the committee used an expression which led me to reflect upon my right to get bound a book that was printed, say, before I was a member of Congress. My colleague said that we might have bound books to which we were entitled. I am not entitled to a report made ten, fifteen, or twenty years ago; yet I have had several of those things collected and bound up. I want to know whether, technically, I was wrong, or whether the existing law does restrict us to books that are issued to us during our terms.

Mr. MANDERSON. That seems to be the existing law.

Mr. HAWLEY. I think it ought to be changed, then.

Mr. MANDERSON. It is a law—

More honored in the breach than the observance.

Mr. HAWLEY. I know it has been construed that a member might have any book ever published by the Government bound for his own use, and I have acted upon that supposition. I should like to have the law changed now so as to condone my past offenses.

Mr. COCKRELL. I know I have had a number thus bound. For example, I got together all the documents in regard to Indian depredation claims—the whole history of them as far as I could get them from the foundation up, and I had them bound in one volume. So I got all the documents in regard to the direct tax and all the reports that had been made upon that subject. Some few of them, small documents, were issued, as a matter of course, before my term began in the Senate, but I had them all bound together so that I could have the whole question before me. I did the same in regard to captured and abandoned property, and the purchase and sale of vessels, and all that. I tried to get together every report that had been made from the beginning of the war up to the present time, so that I could have them for reference. They have proved of very great value.

In the same way I have collected a list of all the claims that have ever been presented to Congress from the beginning of the Government. I did not have them rebound simply because they were in large enough volumes and they had already been bound, but I gathered them together and had the later ones bound that had not been, so that I could in a few moments refer to these, and in the case of any claim that ever had been presented to the Government from the foundation of it up the present time I could in a few minutes trace its entire history. These things are absolutely necessary as efficient implements of successful work in the Senate, and certainly we ought to be allowed to procure them in that way. As a matter of course the privilege ought not to be abused, however.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The reading of the bill will be resumed.

The Chief Clerk read section 21 of the bill, as follows:

SEC. 21. The chief clerk, the foreman of printing, and a person designated by the Joint Committee on Printing, shall constitute a board of condemnation, who, upon the call of the Public Printer, shall determine the condition of presses and other machinery and material used in the Government Printing Office, with a view to condemnation.

In case ruling machines, stitching machines, or other machinery or material used in the bindery shall become the subject of inquiry, with a view to condemnation, the foreman of binding shall be substituted on the board in place of the foreman of printing.

Mr. COCKRELL. I wish to make an inquiry in regard to the first portion of the section:

The chief clerk, the foreman of printing, and a person designated by the Joint Committee on Printing, shall constitute a board of condemnation.

Would that be a permanent designation or just a designation for the time being? This is a new section, and there has been no action, as a matter of course, under it or under any similar law. What was the intention? Is this to be an officer of the Government or an outsider?

Mr. MANDERSON. Oh, no; it is to be some one in the Public Printing Office; that would be the natural action of the Joint Committee on Printing. This is simply putting in the form of law that which under the best management of the Public Printing Office has existed in practice.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is what I wanted to get at.

Mr. MANDERSON. I have not the page of the testimony, but from the testimony of the Public Printer and the foreman of binding and the foreman of printing it will be found that there has been, under the present Public Printer and I think also under Mr. Benedict, a board of this character in the Public Printing Office for the purpose of preventing the improper disposition of worn material that was in the Printing Office, and also that the Government Printer might have some warrant for his action when he came to dispose of a press or machinery of any description. The idea of the committee simply was that the chief clerk, the foreman of printing, and some person designated by the joint committee, who would naturally, I think, be an employé of the Printing Office, should constitute this board of condemnation to decide whether a machine or press was so worn that it should be condemned and sold.

Mr. HAWLEY. My colleague referred to some testimony upon which he could not lay his finger at the moment. I have found it, if the Senator from Missouri will kindly listen.

Mr. COCKRELL. Yes, I hear.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. RICHARDSON, a House member——

Mr. MANDERSON. On what page?

Mr. HAWLEY. On page 17. Mr. RICHARDSON was on the Printing Committee in the last House, but during the recess, when the committee had been holding a session for investigation, he acted as a sort of voluntary member, thinking he would probably be on the committee in this Congress.

Mr. MANDERSON. He was a member of our committee.

Mr. HAWLEY. He was a member of the old committee.

Mr. MANDERSON. He was a member of the special committee.

Mr. HAWLEY. He was made so by law.

Mr. MANDERSON. He was made so by a concurrent resolution of the two Houses.

Mr. HAWLEY. There was no Committee on Printing of the other House in existence while this investigation was conducted.

Mr. RICHARDSON. In respect to the condemnation of machinery, what is your process of getting rid of machinery when you deem it useless?

Mr. PALMER. We advertise it. We send circulars to all dealers in second-hand printing machinery, as well as the manufacturers of presses and machinery, giving a list of the articles, and inviting proposals for their purchase.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Who condemns it?

Mr. PALMER. In the case of printing presses, the foreman of printing, Capt. Brian, and the foreman of the press room, who in this case is Mr. Auer, condemn the machinery, subject to my indorsement of their judgment.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Have you any board of condemnation, or is the condemnation made by those gentlemen in their discretion?

Mr. PALMER. It is done by the three persons I have named.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Who fixes the price at which the condemned material shall be sold?

Mr. PALMER. I offer it to the public, to the highest bidder, and the man who bids the highest gets the property, provided the bid is considered advantageous to the Government.

Mr. RICHARDSON. It is sold, then, upon the judgment of the gentlemen you have named, to the highest bidder?

Mr. PALMER. Yes, sir.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Do you reserve the right to reject bids and not sell, or do you make the sale absolutely?

Mr. PALMER. We require competition by several bidders; but if there should be practically no competition, and we should consider the bids too low, we should reject them, as we have done in some instances.

Further inquiry was made about the process of exchange, which they did not feel that they had the right to make, but out of which private printers and publishers get considerable advantage. They have an old press which would sell for nothing by itself which the manufacturer of a new press will make a very considerable allowance for; he will allow a much larger sum than the thing can be sold for in the market.

Mr. COCKRELL. The question of exchanging old for new presses, while it is an important one——

Mr. HAWLEY. Is dangerous.

Mr. COCKRELL. Is very dangerous. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] may recall a little instance once where there was an exchange of buggies in the Treasury Department and $175 disappeared in the transaction that we could never get any trace of by the closest scrutiny. Still it may be necessary sometimes really to prevent a sacrifice of old machinery that persons will not bid upon.

Mr. MANDERSON. If I may interrupt the Senator——

Mr. COCKRELL. It is no interruption.

Mr. MANDERSON. I call his attention to the testimony of the Public Printer on page 18, commencing at the foot of page 17:

The CHAIRMAN. Have you any process of exchange by which, in the event of a press becoming obsolete—I do not mean worthless, but if you can economize by getting a different sort of press—you can trade that press in part payment for a new one?

Mr. PALMER. We have no authority to do that.

The CHAIRMAN. Would not that be advisable?

Mr. PALMER. I made a recommendation for that in the first report I sent to Congress, in which I stated that it would be an advantage to the Government Printing Office if we could have the authority to make such exchanges.

Mr. HAWLEY. Is it not the uniform custom of private printing establishments to make such exchanges?

Mr. PALMER. Yes, sir; and sometimes with advantage to themselves.

Now I call the attention of the Senator to the following section, section 22, which provides that when these articles are condemned as unserviceable, then the Public Printer may sell the same to the highest bidder for cash, and he is allowed to exchange them only when in his opinion the sums offered for the advertised property shall be deemed too low. So we throw upon him the burden of first making the effort to sell, and only in the event that the property is about to be sacrificed for some insignificant amount is he permitted to exchange the old material in part payment for new.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The reading of the bill will proceed.

The Chief Clerk read sections 22 and 23.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to know for what period of time the Public Printer's report is to be made.

Mr. MANDERSON. Naturally I should say that, being made the first day of each regular session of Congress, it would be for the year preceding. It is exactly the present law under which we have had the Public Printer to make reports.

Mr. COCKRELL. How has he been making his reports? Has he been making them for the fiscal year?

Mr. MANDERSON. For the fiscal year.

Mr. COCKRELL. This is more directly under the control of Congress than any other branch of the service, and it strikes me that instead of the report being for the fiscal year it ought to come up to the end of the first quarter, to the 30th of September. That could be very readily done, and it would give Congress a great deal better idea of what had been done near the meeting of Congress and give it better information than to let the report date back only to the 30th of June. We have been heretofore appropriating money and requiring only a certain amount to be expended in each quarter or each half of the year.

Mr. ALLISON. In each half.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Public Printer could very readily render his account up to the 1st of October. That would be three months longer, and it would simply give Congress that much more information. That is the only suggestion I make.

Mr. MANDERSON. The Senator from Missouri is far more familiar with that subject than I am. The joint committee, finding that the reports had been made up to the end of each fiscal year, at the commencement of each session of Congress, did not think it desirable to make any change, as there seemed to have been no complaint in regard to the matter. I think myself perhaps it would be far more valuable as a report to Congress if it were brought up to the first day of the session as to the general conduct of affairs in the Public Printing Office. I think the Public Printer would naturally do that thing; but as to his accounts, I do not know whether it is desirable to make an exception in his case to the rule which I think obtains as to all officers of the Government, that they shall make their accounts of receipts and disbursements to the end of the fiscal year. I certainly have no objection, if the Senator thinks it desirable to make the Public Printer an exception to the general rule, that the bill should be so amended.

Mr. COCKRELL. It would simply give Congress more specific information in regard to the progress of the work. We frequently do not know when a document is to come out. Sometimes it is delayed, as the Senator well knows. For example, take volume 1 of the United States Geological and Geographical Surveys by Wheeler west of the one hundredth meridian, I believe. Of those volumes, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, and, I believe, 7 or 8, whatever the exact number was, were issued, and volume 1 came out in the past year. Evidently it was in the course of preparation when it was given the number of volume 1, and I suppose every Senator probably has had a dozen applications for it, supposing, as a matter of course, that as volumes 2, 3, 4, and 5 had been printed, certainly volume 1 had been printed, when it had not been actually printed and issued by the Government Printing Office. So it is sometimes with other publications. This would enable us to know exactly the progress that had been made. As a matter of course it would be information which the Committee on Appropriations always has to obtain before it passes upon any of these appropriation items.

Mr. ALLISON. I suggest to the Senator in charge of the bill that I think this section ought to be more definite and significant. Whilst it may be, as is stated, I see, in the report, substantially a reprint of the existing law, it seems to me that the Public Printer should be required to make full statements, such as are required here for the past fiscal year; and then under the latter clause of the section he should be required to give such other information touching the matters connected with the Printing Office as may be in his possession. That would cover a portion of the current fiscal year, showing, if you please, the amount of printing which had been done since the last fiscal year closed, and on what account, the probabilities as respects the work in hand, etc. That information is usually imparted by the Public Printer to the committees of this body in making up the appropriations for the fiscal year, and especially has it been imparted for the last two years, because usually there has been a deficiency in the regular annual appropriations for the public printing.

The Committee on Appropriations has usually called the Public Printer before it or required the Public Printer to make a statement of the exact condition of the printing for the first six months of the current fiscal year. So I suggest to the chairman that he provide for a full, specific, and definite report as respects the fiscal year closed and then that the Public Printer shall give such other and additional information respecting the current work as may be practicable at the time. It seems to me that would make this perfectly clear.

Mr. MANDERSON. I should be very glad if the Senator would suggest any amendment that will reach that result. As I have said, this is, I think, the identical language of the existing law.

Mr. ALLISON. So I see.

Mr. MANDERSON. The law was passed originally in 1860 and was amended in 1861, 1864, 1865, 1866, and 1872. We have been acting under this law since 1872 as it now reads.

Mr. ALLISON. What is section 3821 of the Revised Statutes?

Mr. MANDERSON. I will read it, and the Senator will follow section 23.

The Congressional Printer—

We change of course to the present appellation of Public Printer—shall, on the first day of each session, or as soon thereafter as may be practicable, report to Congress the exact condition, and the amount and cost of the public printing, binding, lithographing, and engraving; the amount and cost of all paper purchased for the same; a detailed statement of proposals made and contracts entered into for the purchase of paper and other materials, and for lithographing and engraving; of all payments made, during the preceding year, under his direction; of the amount of work ordered and done, with a general classification thereof, for each Department, and a detailed statement of each account with the Departments or public officers; a detailed statement of the number of hands employed in the establishment, and the time each has been employed; and such further information, touching all matters connected with the Printing Office, as may be in his possession.

I do not think the changes are at all material. We strike out, as I recall it now, the words "as soon thereafter as may be practicable," so as to absolutely require that this report shall come in on the first day of the session.

Mr. ALLISON. It may be that the present phraseology is definite enough to cover what is required in the report; but I think in any report there should be a distinction drawn between a report as respects a fiscal year closed and one current. If that distinction could be drawn here in a way to make it clear, I think it might be wise to do it; but I have no doubt that the Public Printer under this section would give a detailed statement of the affairs of the office for the last fiscal year, and, if required, certainly would give the condition of the Printing Office at the moment of making his report.

Mr. MANDERSON. I think that has been his practice in his reports.

Mr. ALLISON. It has been, I know.

Mr. MANDERSON. That is to say, in his detailed statements. In his financial statements he confines himself to the fiscal year passed, but when he comes to his report proper he makes comments upon the current business.

Mr. ALLISON. We might say, on page 9, line 2, "shall report to Congress for the last fiscal year." That would make it clear.

Mr. MANDERSON. I do not object to the change.

Mr. ALLISON. In the eighth line the phrase is used, "during the preceding year," of course meaning the fiscal year, as respects accounts. I do not suggest that modification unless it is perfectly acceptable to the Senator, because I think probably the present phraseology is sufficient.

Mr. MANDERSON. He is doing now and has been for many years exactly that same thing.

Mr. ALLISON. Then perhaps it is wise to leave it as it is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The reading of the bill will proceed.

The Chief Clerk read section 24, as follows:

SEC. 24. The employés of the Government Printing Office, whether employed by the piece or otherwise, shall be allowed leaves of absence with pay to the extent of not exceeding thirty days in any one fiscal year under such regulations and at such times as the Public Printer may designate. Such employés as are engaged on piecework shall receive the same rate of pay for the said thirty days' leave as will be paid to day hands: Provided, That those regularly employed on the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD shall receive leave, with pay at the close of each session pro rata for the time of such employment: And further provided, That it shall be lawful to allow pro rata leave to those serving fractional parts of the year.

Mr. COCKRELL. As I understand that leave of absence matter it is just as the existing law is.

Mr. MANDERSON. Exactly, except a change which I do not think is at all material, but it was thought well to insert it—the words "shall be allowed leave of absence with pay to the extent of not exceeding thirty days in any one fiscal year."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The reading of the bill will be continued.

The Chief Clerk read section 25, as follows:

SEC. 25. There shall be reserved by the Public Printer from the quota of each Member of Congress and Delegate one copy of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in unstitched form, to be delivered upon demand of each Member or Delegate; and there shall be furnished to each standing committee of Congress one copy, which shall be bound promptly in paper when each semimonthly index shall be issued and shall be delivered without delay; and the Public Printer shall supply, at the end of each session, to each standing committee, filing requisition therefor, one set of the permanent RECORD bound in half Russia, with the name of the committee printed on the back.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to have the Senator explain what is the difference now; what change does this make? What is meant by the RECORD in unstitched form?

Mr. MANDERSON. This action is taken at the suggestion of the very efficient foreman of printing, Capt. Brian, and is in the direction of economy. Nearly every member of Congress sends to the Public Printer every two weeks during the session the stitched copies of the RECORD, that they may be put in bound form for his convenience. Now, the proposition is that one copy shall be retained at the Government Printing Office unstitched, and that whenever the index shall be published, every two weeks, there shall be sent to him a bound copy with the index. It saves the expense of stitching and then tearing apart again for the purpose of rebinding. In the testimony, I think of Capt. Brian, will be found a statement of how large an amount of money this means when you take the large number of RECORDS that are thus sent to the Public Printing Office.

Mr. COCKRELL. On what page is Mr. Brian's testimony?

Mr. MANDERSON. At page 25 the testimony begins. It is the testimony of Mr. White, who is the foreman of binding, on page 81. On page 83 of the report will be found what is meant by it:

The CHAIRMAN. Have you any suggestions to make as to any proper change to be made in the binding of Government publications?

Mr. WHITE. Yes, sir; I have given this matter some little thought since I was told that I would be called before this committee. There is one change which should be made at once, and that is in reference to the binding of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for Senators and Members. Each Senator and Member has a copy of the RECORD bound up to date about every two weeks, as the index appears, and the RECORDS are sent to the bindery with the wire stitches in them. Those wires have to be taken out and the RECORDS pressed, making the expense of binding them about $1.25 a volume. If the Public Printer were authorized to retain a sufficient number of copies, unstitched, to be bound up as called for by Senators and Members, they could easily be bound for 75 cents a volume.

The CHAIRMAN. The difference in cost being the expense of taking out the wire stitches?

Mr. WHITE. Yes, sir; taking the old stitches out and preparing the RECORDS for binding. The RECORD for the Fifty-first Congress made about 28 volumes.

The CHAIRMAN. That is, the two sessions?

Mr. WHITE. Yes, sir. I find that the saving by the plan I suggest would be about $6,000 in binding the number of volumes composing the proceedings of the Fifty-first Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. Your idea is that each member of Congress should be furnished, in the first instance, with the RECORD every morning, placed upon his desk or delivered at his house, as he prefers, and that from his quota another copy should be retained at the Government Printing Office, unstitched, to be bound when the index comes out, which is every two weeks?

Mr. WHITE. Yes, sir; to be bound and delivered to each Senator and Member with his name on it.

So it is to save that expense that this proposition is adopted.

Mr. GORMAN. I suggest to the chairman of the committee that he had better strike out the words "upon demand of" before "each Member or Delegate," and insert "to;" so as to provide that these volumes shall be delivered to them the same as to the committees.

Mr. MANDERSON. I certainly have no objection to that. The idea was that perhaps there might be some who would not need them, and if so, the expense of binding those copies would be saved.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Maryland will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 25, line 4, it is proposed to strike out the words "upon demand of" and insert in lieu thereof the word "to;" so as to read:

To be delivered to each Member or Delegate.

Mr. MANDERSON. I certainly have no objection to that amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. May I ask the Senator in charge of the bill whether these provisions change in any way the present custom. I understood from the reading of the testimony that it is proposed to furnish to each Member and Senator only one copy. The present custom is to furnish to each Senator a copy at his place of lodging or house and also a copy on his desk.

Mr. MANDERSON. That is not changed. Further on in the bill we provide for that, when we come to the distribution of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. This part of the bill simply applies to the duties of the Public Printer, and I will say here what perhaps I should have said before. The effort of the committee has been to make a complete codification of the printing law and repeal in set terms all provisions of law that now exist with reference to the public printing. When we came to make this examination we found a most lamentable condition of the law. The public printing was being done not only by general law, in laws found in appropriation acts, but much printing was being done for which there seemed to be no warrant whatever in the law. It had grown up upon orders from committees, orders from officers of the two Houses or from the Departments, and it was considered well to make a repeal of all existing statutes, and in this bill to make such codification of the law that one could turn to it and find warrant for whatever it was thought well to do in the way of public printing. So when we come to the proper place in the bill the matter of the distribution of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD will be found.

Mr. COCKRELL. Has this question been considered by the committee?

There shall be reserved by the Public Printer from the quota of each Member of Congress and Delegate one copy of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in unstitched form, to be delivered to each Member or Delegate; and there shall be furnished to each standing committee of Congress one copy, which shall be bound promptly in paper when each semimonthly index shall be issued and shall be delivered without delay; and the Public Printer shall supply, at the end of each session, to each standing committee, filing requisition therefor, one set of the permanent RECORD bound in half Russia, with the name of the committee printed on the back.

Now, is that to be additional to the one copy that is furnished?

Mr. MANDERSON. Yes, and for the reason which I shall state. This will be the practical working of this section, I understand. In the unstitched form there will be retained at the Public Printing Office of the quota of each member of Congress one set that will be sent to him every two weeks when the index of the RECORD is printed.

Mr. COCKRELL. But it does not say so.

Mr. MANDERSON. Why not?

Mr. COCKRELL. This section does not say so.

Mr. MANDERSON. Why not?

Mr. COCKRELL. How does it?

Mr. MANDERSON.—

There shall be reserved by the Public Printer from the quota of each Member of Congress and Delegate one copy of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in unstitched form, to be delivered to each Member or Delegate.

Mr. COCKRELL. Delivered when? When would that copy be delivered?

Mr. MANDERSON. "When each semimonthly index shall be issued."

Mr. COCKRELL. But it does not say so.

Mr. MANDERSON. Let us make it say so if that is not sufficiently explicit.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is the point exactly. That is what it does not say when you read it and analyze it.

Mr. MANDERSON. That is the purpose.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is the end. There is a semicolon there, and then follow the words "and there shall be furnished," etc. It is a new sentence practically—and there shall be furnished to each standing committee of Congress one copy, which shall be bound promptly in paper when each semimonthly index shall be issued—

That is the one copy reserved for the committee—and shall be delivered without delay.

Mr. MANDERSON. The language may be somewhat ambiguous. I suggest to the Senator in order to reach certainty in the matter, and that is all we want, to insert, in line 6, after the word "which," the words "copies for members and committees;" so as to read:

And there shall be furnished to each standing committee of Congress one copy, which copies for members and committees shall be bound promptly in paper when each semi-monthly index shall be issued.

Mr. COCKRELL. That will do.

Mr. MANDERSON. That will reach it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. COCKRELL. Now, Mr. President, I want to appeal to the Senator. What is the necessity for furnishing all the standing committees of the Senate with a bound set of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, with the name of the committee upon it, as the property of the committee.

We have from six to ten volumes of the RECORD at a session. Already there is scarcely a committee room that has space enough in it for the books it has, and we are here constituting every standing committee a library of the whole CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. How many years will it be until there will not be a committee room here that will hold the bound volumes of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD? I do not think the standing committees ought to have any bound copies of the RECORD. They have no right to it; it is of no benefit to them. They get a copy during the session of the Senate. That is necessary. We have a certain number of copies here in the Senate library that every Senator has access to. Why shall we have in each standing committee room a library containing all these volumes? It seems to me that it is just that much absolute waste. I do not think it is of any benefit at all.

Mr. MANDERSON. I quite agree with the Senator in his criticism upon that subject, but the committee found that under the existing law or under the custom, I do not know which it is, there is regularly bound at the end of each session in half Russia a full set of the permanent RECORD, and it is delivered to the committee rooms. The Committee on Printing were somewhat loth to depart from this custom, but they did so to this extent, and I call the attention of the Senator to the language of the section:

The Public Printer shall supply, at the end of each session, to each standing committee, filing requisition therefor.

So the new departure proposed by the committee is that a set of the permanent RECORD shall only be furnished to such committees as make requisition upon the Public Printer for it, and those that do not need it (and I confess that I think very few do need it) need not make requisition and need not have the RECORD in permanent form.

Mr. COCKRELL. I was chairman once or twice of a standing committee, and I have had the honor of being on the committee of which the distinguished Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] has been chairman for many years. I never have seen any bound copy of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD furnished the Committee on Appropriations, and it never has been furnished to any committee that I have been chairman of. I confess that when I read this provision last night I was considerably astonished to find that it was said here that all the standing committees of the Senate had had a complete set of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD bound in this way with the name of the committee upon it. I have no recollection of anything of that kind. It has not been thus bound for the committee of which I have been chairman, and it has not been furnished to it.

Mr. PLATT. Bound in what way; in the ordinary way or some other way?

Mr. COCKRELL. Bound in any way. I have had furnished to the committee during the session copies of the RECORD every morning. The committee gets that, but then at the end to have a complete bound set furnished to the committee I think is a terrible waste, and there is no occasion for it, because there is not a committee here that has room enough to keep these bound volumes for more than a few sessions. I can not recall these bound volumes of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in any committee room of the Senate.

Mr. VEST. Are they charged for?

Mr. COCKRELL. That is the question. That is the very point I am calling to the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Printing. If these things are charged for I should like to see where they have gone. I do not understand that they have been furnished. I do not think that the information is correct, and if it is correct I doubt very seriously whether the committee have ever received these bound volumes, and if they ever have received them they have no use for them, and we ought to stop it and put an end to it by express legislation.

Mr. MANDERSON. I have personal knowledge only of the one committee of which I am chairman, and I know there is delivered every year one set of the permanent RECORD, on the back of which is marked "The Committee on Printing."

Mr. COCKRELL. That I think is very proper. It is probable that that is done for the Committee on Printing, but I can not believe that it is done for all the other standing committees.

Mr. MANDERSON. That is the understanding I have had.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to have some Senators who are chairmen of committees state what is the fact in regard to that matter.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not see the chairman of the Committee on Finance here, but I think that committee receives a copy. Certainly the Committee on Appropriations does not, or if it does we have no place to deposit the copy. Our committee room is filled with documents and papers relating to current affairs. We have a few decisions of the Court of Claims there, etc., but we certainly have not a set of the RECORD.

Mr. MANDERSON. Not of the permanent RECORD?

Mr. ALLISON. Not the permanent RECORD, and never have had to my knowledge.

Mr. PLATT. I do not speak with a great deal of certainty on the subject, but it is certainly my impression that I have taken from those copies which are awarded to me as a Senator during the session, and which may be bound up at the end of the session if any remain which are not sent out, and have obtained a set for my committee room. I have taken my own personal set for my committee room.

Mr. COCKRELL. Then your committee has been furnished with a copy?

Mr. PLATT. Not as I understand it.

Mr. MANDERSON. There may be no uniformity of action in the matter. We all know what has been the course with reference to books in committee rooms. They have become, as is suggested by the Senator from Missouri, a burden to the committee rooms, and many committee rooms have been stripped entirely of Government publications; some of them have bare walls that used to be lined with shelves of books. I know that this permanent RECORD has come to the Committee on Printing. I am informed by the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations that it has come regularly to his committee. But whether it be true or not as to all, the question now is——

Mr. COCKRELL. One moment. Does the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations say that at the close of the session a bound set of the volumes of the RECORD has been sent to the Committee on Foreign Relations with the name of that committee on it?

Mr. MANDERSON. Yes, I so understand.

Mr. SHERMAN. I certainly receive copies periodically in the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. COCKRELL. Oh, the Committee on Foreign Relations receive every morning a copy of the RECORD.

Mr. SHERMAN. Oh, no; we get a regularly bound set every two or three weeks. It is very convenient indeed, and very necessary for the committee.

Mr. MANDERSON. No, but we are speaking of the permanent RECORD.

Mr. SHERMAN. I mean the permanent RECORD. The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD; is that what you mean?

Mr. COCKRELL. You mean that it is bound semimonthly with the index to it?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. COCKRELL. Now, after the session closes is your committee furnished with a complete bound set of nine or ten volumes, with the name of the committee on it?

Mr. SHERMAN. No; we have the one that is furnished to us. It is generally indexed through. We have it there always.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is a very different matter. That this bill provides for. Then the question is whether at the end of the session a bound set is furnished to the committee.

Mr. SHERMAN. Oh, no; I did not say that.

Mr. COCKRELL. The question is whether complete bound volumes of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD are furnished to the standing committees with the name of the committee upon the back.

Mr. SHERMAN. No; there is simply one copy furnished from time to time, bound in a very convenient form, about half the size of the ordinary volume.

Mr. COCKRELL. I understand that is what the law provides for. We have a semimonthly index, and the RECORD is attached to it. Those are all bound together and furnished. I have never had them bound, but last session I was furnished one or two. I never got them, and if they were ever furnished to my committee I never saw them.

Mr. ALLISON. On further inquiry I am able to say that the Committee on Appropriations does not receive bound copies of the RECORD, nor does it receive bound copies of any public document.

Mr. MANDERSON. Does the Senator say that the Committee on Appropriations, as one of the standing committees of the Senate, has not received the bound documents known as reserve?

Mr. ALLISON. I so understand.

Mr. MANDERSON. Then it must be because some order has been made that they shall not be delivered to the committee rooms.

Mr. ALLISON. I think it originates from the fact that the Committee on Appropriations, with a good many other committees of this body, are committees of recent organization, and that this set is furnished under some old order only to the older standing committees of the body that have been in existence for a long time. It does not apply to new committees. I am informed by the clerk of the committee, who knows about everything as respects these matters, that the committee does not receive bound copies of the RECORD or of any public document.

Mr. MANDERSON. That simply emphasizes what I said a while ago as to the great difficulty that the Committee on Printing labored under in ascertaining under what law or custom the printing and binding and the distribution and delivery of books had been made. The committee certainly were under the impression that the permanent RECORD was furnished to each committee as the reserve documents, so-called, are furnished to each committee.

The question, however, that is important now is to know whether it is advisable to permit any committee that may want the permanent RECORD and will file a requisition therefor to have it. I certainly, so far as any committee that I am connected with may be concerned, have no desire for it. As the Senator from Missouri says, it can very easily be obtained at any time by sending to the Senate library for it; and if it is considered best to strike out the provision that upon the requisition of a committee a set of the permanent RECORD shall be furnished, let us strike it out. The Committee on Printing certainly are not tenacious for anything there is in the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. I understand that.

Mr. MANDERSON. The committee have simply tried to perform the duty with which they were charged by the Senate and bring this bill here for consideration, making such economical changes in the existing law as they deem advisable. If in the further interest of economy it is well to strike this out, let us strike it out. All it needs is a motion.

Mr. COCKRELL. Here is the point: Is there any testimony in the report of the committee which indicates that these copies have been furnished? That is the question that I want the committee to look into. That is the reason why I raised the point.

Mr. MANDERSON. I was under the impression——

Mr. COCKRELL. If there is any evidence which has been furnished the committee I should like to have it traced, for I certainly have misunderstood the whole question if the permanent RECORD is so furnished. I think it very natural and very probable that they would furnish the Committee on Printing with a set, but certainly I can not think it has ever been furnished to any other committee. I do not believe it is necessary to furnish it to any committee. That is my judgment clearly.

There is no committee in the Senate that has a room large enough to hold the RECORD for any considerable length of time. We have 25 or 50 copies here in the Senate library under our own control, and the library is on the same floor with one-third of the committee rooms, and the committees can very readily get the RECORD there. If one committee makes a requisition and gets it, some other committee may get it for two or three sessions and it will take up a good deal of space, and then the next chairman will abandon it and it will amount to nothing. Certainly I do not believe Congress will undertake to furnish room to store the bound volumes of the RECORD for every standing committee that may undertake to get it.

Mr. MANDERSON. The Senator can very easily reach what he desires by moving to strike out these lines. There is no one tenacious for them. I certainly am not.

Mr. VEST. I agree with my colleague; my experience makes me very positive on this subject. Any Senator, whether he is chairman of a committee or not, who desires to refer to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD sends to the document room or the Senate library. It is simply impossible that we should keep these bound public documents in our committee rooms.

The statement made to-day by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations is a most significant one. I called attention to this matter some years ago, but without any success, I believe. He states that he does not know of any bound public documents coming to the Committee on Appropriations, one of the first committees of the Senate. He will find upon examination that all these documents have been sent there and carted to the basement of the Capitol or wheeled there in a wheelbarrow. I have not visited it this session, but I did last, and the basement of the Capitol to-day, I undertake to say, is crowded with old débris in the shape of bound documents and unbound documents sent from the Printing Office that are rotting and producing foul air; and we hear complaints daily in regard to the atmosphere of this Chamber. All these documents are necessarily carried there. There has been a struggle between the Printing Office and the officers of the Senate as to getting rid of them. The Public Printer says he has no place for them. The officers of the Senate say they have no place to store them. There is no room in the committee rooms for them.

Nothing can be better evidence of the necessity of reform than this simple statement. There is no necessity for issuing these bound copies of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to committees. I have been chairman of regular committees, and I am chairman now of a special committee. If I want a volume of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD I send to Amzi Smith for it, and so does every other Senator. It is only rarely that a Senator wants a copy of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to take to his residence or to his committee room, and then he sends for it, and it is charged to him out of the 30 copies that are there for the use of Senators.

If we ever propose to commence anything like reform in this printing business, it must be right upon such items as this. I am decidedly in favor of striking out the whole provision.

Mr. COCKRELL. While we are on this question, in view of what my colleague has said, I should like the Senator from Nebraska to answer whether any complete sets of the bound documents are furnished to standing committees, as it is said that the RECORD has been furnished. I think that is a very important question. If they are furnished, as the Senator from Iowa has said, and they are not furnished to the Committee on Appropriations—there is no room for them and they are not wanted. Now, where are they?

Mr. ALLISON. I did not say that the Committee on Appropriations was furnished with them. On the contrary, I said the Committee on Appropriations, from its inception and organization, as I understand, has never been supplied with a copy of the bound volume of the RECORD or with a bound copy of any public document issued by Congress.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am only saying that the committee has not been furnished. Is it charged that it has been furnished? That is the question I want to know.

Mr. ALLISON. That I do not know.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is the question I am after. That brings it right down to the point. I want to know whether it is charged that the Public Printing Office has furnished the Committee on Appropriations with a complete set of the bound volumes, and whether it is charged that it has furnished other standing committees; because this is not a new question; it is a question of long standing. We want to know what has been the record in the Public Printing Office as to whether these charges have been made of a complete set of all the bound documents being delivered to each standing committee of the Senate and also a set of the bound volumes of the RECORD. It is a very important question. I am certain you can not go to a committee room here and find such volumes there; and if they are not there, where are they? There is not room enough to hold them, and I never supposed that they were furnished.

Mr. CULLOM. I suppose in the case of any committee if the committee asks for them it could have them furnished. They are in the building for that purpose, are they not?

Mr. VEST. There are 30 copies of the bound RECORD in the document room.

Mr. CULLOM. I do not know anything about it myself, but I have supposed always that a set was furnished for every committee of the Senate, and that it was given to that committee. I do not know whether that is the case or not.

Mr. VEST. The reports of the bureaus and the Departments are furnished to the committees. I understand that they have been furnished for years.

Mr. COCKRELL. Bound?

Mr. VEST. Yes, bound. There is no room for them in the committee rooms. Where do all the documents come from that are in the basement of the Capitol?

Mr. CULLOM. That is the difficulty. There is no place to put them.

Mr. VEST. Where does all this débris come from?

Mr. COCKRELL. My good friend from Iowa shakes his head. I suppose very few Senators are more closely in their committee rooms than the Senator from Iowa. He has been chairman of the Committee on Appropriations about as long as any Senator has been chairman of a committee, and he ought to know about it. I was chairman for a short time, two years, of one committee, and two years of another standing committee, and I did not know anything about it. If they were furnished I never heard of it.

I am directing the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Printing to that particular inquiry, because he has the facilities for ascertaining specifically, so that we may know exactly. I propose, if that is the case, that the amendment I shall offer to this section shall not only prevent the furnishing of the RECORD in bound form after the close of the session to each standing committee, but also all the other documents. Then each committee can get it at any time it wants. The chairman of a standing committee of the Senate, if any book be absolutely necessary for the transaction of the public business, has authority to make a requisition and have it furnished, even if it is not a public document. If it is a public document, we have whatever number of copies there may be in the Senate library, 25 or 50 copies, and they can always be had there, to be charged to the committee and returned when they are through with it.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I want to state one single fact. The ex-clerk of the Committee on Commerce, of which I have been a member for ten or twelve years, has just stated to me that at one time he took out from our committee room twenty-five bags of public documents and put them in the basement of the Capitol—twenty-five bags for which there was no earthly use or place.

Mr. CULLOM. They were old, were they not?

Mr. VEST. No; they had been sent there from week to week and from month to month from the Public Printing Office. The books are rotting now in the basement of the Capitol, and the leather on the books and the paper; and we complain of foul air here. The upper portion of the Capitol was last session crowded with public documents, until the Architect of the Capitol came to our Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds and said that unless something was done a fire might originate which would blow off the roof of the Capitol. It would not destroy the walls——

Mr. COCKRELL. They were unbound documents.

Mr. VEST. They were unbound documents, but down in the basement are the bound documents. It is damp in the basement and they can not burn there, but they will rot there if they are not taken out. They are there with the tags on them, with the names of the committees. That has been the case for years. I called attention to it some five or six years ago. It did no good, and it has gone on increasing. I have not visited there this session, for it is not a pleasant place to visit, but as a member of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds I made a personal investigation a year ago and found that state of things to exist.

Mr. MANDERSON. I do not think that the Senator from Missouri who last addressed the Senate [Mr. VEST] need lose heart. The desirable result that he wishes will be accomplished by the passage of this bill. His frequent efforts in behalf of a more economical administration of affairs and a proper disposition of this vast accumulation of plunder that he refers to will all be reached by the passage of this bill.

Mr. VEST. I am not attacking the bill.

Mr. MANDERSON. I do not understand that the Senator is; but take the very statement that he made. My impression certainly has been (perhaps I reached that conclusion because of the experience in my own committee room) that not only was this permanent RECORD, but what we know as the reserved documents which contain every publication that has been made by Congress, sent regularly to every committee room that would receive them. The vast accumulation that the Senator refers to in the basement of the Capitol was the output from the committee rooms that were crowded in their capacity by this vast collection of public documents.

Now, we propose to reach that very evil. It is true that in this Capitol, by this refuse material that has been sent to the basement from the committee rooms, from abandoned quotas of members of the two Houses of Congress and from many sources, from the overflow of the document room and of the folding room, there are hundreds of thousands of documents that seem to be without an owner. There is no power under the present condition of affairs to dispose of them. They are not the private property of the chairmen of committees. A chairman finds them in his committee room, and he sends them to the basement of the Capitol, and there they are put in bags, tagged with the name of the committee. He does not feel that he has any right to distribute them or to sell them and put the money into the Treasury of the Government. This bill proposes to reach that accumulation. Turning to section 70 of the bill I read, so as to show that we are at least trying to accomplish some reform in this direction:

All documents at present remaining in charge of the several Executive Departments, bureaus, and offices of the Government not required for official use shall be delivered to the superintendent of documents, and hereafter all public documents accumulating in said Departments, bureaus, and offices not needed for official use shall be annually turned over to the superintendent of documents for distribution or sale.

Under the provisions of this proposed act. That is designed to meet the great accumulation of documents in the Departments. In the Executive Departments the same condition of affairs exists. We propose to take them out, if we can, and have an annual house-cleaning hereafter. Now, the next provision is as follows:

The Secretary and Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate, and the Clerk and Doorkeeper of the House, shall cause an invoice to be made of all books stored in and about the Capitol other than those belonging to the quota of Members of Congress and Delegates; and all such documents, unless ordered to be retained by the chairmen of committees by which they have been stored, shall be transferred to the superintendent of documents for distribution and sale, as provided in this act, and such invoicing and transfer shall be made annually hereafter.

The object of this measure is to take this rotting stuff referred to by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] and give it its proper distribution among the people. So we are trying to reach many of the evils. We can not reach them all in the section under consideration.

As to the matter in question here which has been raised by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL], I have no desire, and no member of the committee has any desire, to force the permanent RECORD or any documents upon the committees. We found, or supposed we had found, that the practice was as I have stated, that these books were sent to the standing committees, and now we do not want them forced upon the committees, but we say they shall be sent there only upon the requisition of the chairmen.

Mr. HAWLEY. I think I can relieve the Senate on this question very largely. I have consulted the distinguished keeper of the Senate document room, whom we affectionately call Amzi, and he tells me there has been assigned to him, under some old rule, whereof the memory of man runneth not to the contrary, 36 copies. Eighteen he has kept for that consulting library to which reference has been made. That is where you get a book at any time you want it—a certain number of a certain Congress of that 18. Of the other 18, under this old rule, it was the habit to give bound sets to committees. Some committees have been formed since that rule—nobody knows when—was made, and they have not had them; and of the eighteen who are entitled to them many refuse them, and those who took them in many cases have ordered them to the basement.

Now, the Senate Committee on Printing had reason to suppose that the committees had them. We did not know why all should not have a right to that set because some chairman had at some time or other a set and he did not want it any more. That is true as to a few of the old original committees, but not true as a general thing. Our Committee on Printing proposes to reduce the evil so that no committee need have it unless it should order it sent. If it is well, as my colleague, the chairman, says, that we should not even give the privilege to a committee—and I do not know that it is a privilege—of having a bound set, we have no objection. It requires but to strike out a single line here. I know that so far as the committee room is concerned of which I have the control I long ago cleared out from it, so far as I could, every book that did not pertain strictly to the business of the committee.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I had a little experience in regard to these public documents some years ago which probably might be duplicated by several other committees. When I first became chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations I found that the vast mass of books which had been sent to that committee room, three volumes deep in great cases, were so disarranged that we could not by possibility find a book that we wanted on any subject. I had a very excellent clerk, and during one vacation I got him to clean out the whole of those books and put them in bags, wrapped in the best possible way, and send them down, I do not know where; I have never seen them since. There are, I suppose, somewhere in the basement of the Capitol thousands of volumes; but we selected from these all that related to diplomatic intercourse, including the American State Papers and American Archives and several other books of reference that had been purchased in the beginning of the Government almost by the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Now, we have a large library, easily accessible, so that anyone at any time can find the volume of diplomatic correspondence for any year, or he can find any letter or question that has been discussed in our diplomatic intercourse. It is a comparatively small library and that is kept up. The diplomatic correspondence is still sent to us, and as to the other documents I do not know where they are sent.

I know the abuse in the accumulation of public documents. I have in my house at home the public documents that have been furnished for thirty-six years. They fill case after case in the garret, and in the cellar sometimes, being the accumulation of a single person. I do not know how many volumes there are; I would not undertake to guess. There are about one hundred a year issued, are there not?

Mr. MANDERSON. Yes, at least that number of reserved documents; more than that now, I think.

Mr. SHERMAN. Those are sent; and they are of no value to a member of Congress; very few members of Congress could find a place to store them. Certainly with the accumulation I have I shall have to either burn them up or get rid of them in some way.

The old method of distributing documents no doubt commenced at the beginning of the Government, when the number distributed would be eight or ten volumes. Indeed, when I first entered public life the Globe was in one or two volumes during a session; three volumes would be a large edition of the Globe for a session. It was cut down a great deal. Now the RECORD itself goes up to eight and ten volumes on an average a year, and it is a vast accumulation which in a very few years would fill almost any house.

In my opinion, as I told my friend on my right here, I think he ought to go a great deal further, not only in decreasing the number of volumes but in cutting down the debates. I believe we ought to have an editor of what is called the RECORD of Congress. There is a vast mass of matter——

Mr. MANDERSON. How long do you think he would live? [Laughter.]

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not know. You say that he would be killed off within a week. I do not want anybody killed off.

Mr. COCKRELL. How would the Senator have that editor selected?

Mr. SHERMAN. I would have selected the most courageous man in America [laughter], and I would give him free latitude to cut and improve my speeches whenever he wanted to do so, provided he reduced them in volume.

Mr. President, I know it is pretty difficult to undertake to do this task, but it ought to be done. In our kindred countries abroad it is done. The debates in the English Parliament, Hansard's Debates, are conducted by a private enterprise and they are really admirable, in volumes of reasonable size and easily handled. It is so also with the Chamber of Deputies in Paris. I do not think that the effete monarchies, as we used to call them, some of them getting to be republics, should have to set us an example about such things; and if we had the RECORD reduced to three volumes a year, as it used to be under the wise management of Blair & Rives—or rather of Mr. Rives, because I think Mr. Blair had nothing to do with the Congressional Globe; if we had some prudent and careful management that would not be interested in swelling the volumes to great numbers it would be a very good thing to do.

I see that my friend on my right is very anxious about this bill. I suppose it will reduce the expenditures of the Government three or four hundred thousand dollars, a considerable sum; but in my judgment if he would cut a little deeper and print less volumes, and distribute less, he might cut off the expenses of the printing for the Government of the United States from one to two million dollars a year. I suppose it now reaches more than that, does it not?

Mr. ALLISON. Nearly $3,000,000.

Mr. SHERMAN. The expenditures reach nearly $3,000,000 now for printing. If there is any desire to promote economy I hope the honorable gentleman of the House of Representatives, who is said to be the great disciple now of economy, will take hold of this matter and put an end to this extravagance. I for one will join with him in doing it.

This effort of my friend from Nebraska to bring order out of this chaos and if possible to reduce the expenses of the printing, and especially to reduce the amount to be printed, would be a great benefit. Here every day Senators, without thinking, involve the Government in a considerable expenditure by an order to print matters that need not be printed at all, which are lost out of sight. Of the thousands of bills that are introduced into this Congress not more than one-fourth will ever be read by a single Senator. It is so much waste money, waste labor; and in my judgment no bill ought to be printed unless it is clearly of a character which requires printing, or unless it is printed upon the report of a committee. Bills printed a dozen times always involve unnecessary expense. I do not propose to start to be a reformer at this period in my life, and I do not intend to try to stop this little wasting at the spigot, but it seems to me that here would be a very good field for some careful, prudent man who would render no doubt a great service to the country if he would see that these unnecessary expenses are lopped off or reduced as much as possible.

With this statement I shall stand by my friend from Nebraska in almost anything he desires to do about this bill. I have read it sufficiently to know that it is an improvement. So far as I know, it does not in any measure or in any direction increase the expenses of the Government, and, while it does not go as far as I should like to have it go, I believe it ought to be passed very much as reported. Then let it be tested by the experience of a year or two, and I have no doubt it will be further improved upon.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move to strike out of section 25 the words:

> And the Public Printer shall supply, at the end of each session, to each standing committee filing a requisition therefor, one set of the permanent RECORD bound in half Russia, with the name of the committee printed on the back.

Mr. President, I desire simply to occupy the attention of the Senate a moment in saying that I am fully in accord with the views entertained by the Senator from Missouri as well as those expressed by the distinguished Senator from Ohio. It seems to me that this committee has done good work, but has not gone far enough in reforming the matter of the issuance of public documents to members of the House of Representatives and to members of this body. If I had my way I should entirely dispense with what is called "the reserve" of Congress. I happened to be a member of the House of Representatives for four years, and I have a room full of books, and they are even now coming to my home, although I left the other House more than two years ago: they are coming there in bagfuls, books that are of no earthly account to me or anybody else. Yet I have either to burn them up at the expense of the Government, or give them storage room at my own expense. I would go, however, in the line suggested——

Mr. MANDERSON. If the Senator will permit me to interrupt him, this bill does dispense with it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Entirely?

Mr. MANDERSON. As to the reserve it does not attempt to force any books upon anybody, as under the present system. I shall call attention to that, however, subsequently.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have an idea that it does to a certain extent dispense with the reserve, but not wholly. I would cut it off root and branch.

Furthermore, as the Senator from Ohio suggested, we are printing vast numbers of bills that are of no earthly account to anybody. In the last Congress the Blair educational bill, which was a very elaborate document, was printed seventeen times in the House of Representatives, having been offered by seventeen different members who wanted to make a little political capital for themselves, perhaps. It ought not to be so. The printing once of a bill in either House ought to be enough, and the further printing ought to be prevented in some way.

Mr. President, the adoption of the amendment that I have offered is in the line of economy. It would prevent the storage of books that nobody wants in the committee rooms of the Senate. I trust the amendment may be adopted, and that as we progress in the consideration of the bill every possible reform in that direction will be inaugurated by the adoption of amendments calculated to reduce the bulk of printing, which certainly has become a great burden upon members of Congress as well as upon the finances of the Government.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, I am sure it must be a satisfaction to my colleague, the chairman of this committee, who gave many laborious weeks, and I do not know but months altogether, during the vacation, to this investigation, I assisting him in spirit but not always in body, to find gentlemen rising here and pointing out evils and suggesting remedies, when they will discover that they will find those remedies in the bill as a rule. They are approving sections of the bill in advance.

We provide for a large reduction in the number of bills to be printed. The abuse is obvious. It has gone on long enough.

We have reduced it so far as we think it can be done safely with regard to the good of the public business. It is not well, in my judgment, to refuse to print any bill or to leave any bill without printing a certain number of copies, for in that way mischief sometimes escapes from public examination. If a bill is printed somebody will discover the foolishness or wickedness of it. Any bill that goes to a committee ought to be printed, for how is a committee to get through with one manuscript copy, and such manuscript as some of us make? It is obviously for the good of the public service to print a limited number of copies of all bills, and this is not a very heavy expense; but if you print a thousand copies more than are necessary, if you print 1,950 copies, or whatever the old limit was, you do make an enormous aggregate of bound volumes, the size of which would frighten anybody.

For one I fully agree with my colleague on the committee in making no objection whatever to striking out the provision here which would give even upon requisition a continuous supply of bound copies of the RECORD to each committee. I do not think it is needed, and everybody knows that. I would strike out entirely what the Senator from New Hampshire suggests should be stricken out, and, of course, as a consequence, also the words just above, "there shall be furnished to each standing committee of Congress one copy."

Mr. SANDERS. Mr. President——

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not want to interrupt the Senator from Montana, but I wished to ask the Senator from Connecticut a question before he concluded, as I believe he is familiar with the newspaper business, and therefore somewhat familiar with printing. Now, we print bills, and we have to reprint some of them. It is useless to refer a bill to a committee unless it is printed, and even then the committee will probably not be able to read all the bills referred to them, and they will certainly never touch a bill that is referred in a bad handwriting.

Suppose you print 100 or 200 or 500 copies, then suppose you add 200 more, what additional expense is that 200 comparatively? Is not that an insignificant and infinitesimal item in the aggregate expenditure for the Public Printing Office? The few additional copies which are furnished, it seems to me, can only cost the paper and ink used in printing them.

Mr. HAWLEY. It is not, as the Senator suggests, 300 or 400 copies of a bill only of one or two or three pages, but many of them run much beyond that, and when you come to take 10,000 bills—and the other House alone, I think, had about 10,000 at the last Congress—does any Senator know the figures exactly?

Mr. MANDERSON. My recollection is that nearly 14,000 were introduced.

Mr. ALLISON. There were over 10,000.

Mr. HAWLEY. I think my colleague is right, that there were about 14,000. When you take 14,000 bills and suppose them to average four pages apiece——

Mr. COCKRELL. A great many are only one page. Hundreds and thousands of them are pension bills.

Mr. HAWLEY. Fourteen thousand bills averaging four pages would make 56,000 pages. Then suppose, instead of 1,000 copies you print 1,950; suppose you reduce 1,950 to 950, then you save a thousand copies each of 14,000 bills. If you will figure up the number of bills and put them in bound volumes, you will find you have got a very respectable load for a train of cars, and a few cents on each makes a big sum. You have to put the form on the press, and whether you run out 300 or 500 copies in a particular case, of course, is a very small figure.

Mr. SANDERS. Mr. President, some portions of this discussion accord with my own views upon the matter, and as to some portions of it I dissent.

Democracy costs something. It can no longer be run on a corncob pipe and barley coffee. The books which we publish and the debates which we distribute are the eyes with which the people of the country see that which is here in their name done, and, for myself, I should oppose this bill if I believed that it was curtailing their observation of the things that are here said and are here done.

I know the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD could be very much curtailed in the number of volumes, but I do not believe it is for the public interest that we shall lay our hands in silence upon the mouth of anybody who speaks here in the name of any of the people. Whatever may be said of folly or of wisdom, they are entitled to know, and, therefore, simply because around this Hall, which occupies 250 feet square of the geographical area of this country, there is a congestion of public documents, is no reason why we should undertake to blind the eyes or stop the ears of the sixty-five millions of people whose business is here done.

All my life I have been made conscious that the distribution of the public documents of the United States was begun in folly and has been perpetuated on the same line. I believe these public documents are invaluable upon the subject to which they appertain. They are not always exhaustless, but they are suggestive and generally wise. The misfortune of those works has been that they have been placed in the wrong hands, and, therefore, we hear them referred to in this debate as "plunder" and other minimizing and diminutive and contemptuous phrases, whereas, as a matter of fact, if they could be placed where those people interested in the various subjects to which they appertain could get hold of them, they would be a part and parcel of the great school wherein our people learn how to govern themselves.

I am glad to know that in and around this building and in and around the Printing Office and in the other offices of the Government here there is a surplus of these books. We have recently admitted into the American Union, upon an equal footing with the original States, six new States. We have from four to six more that at an early day, let us hope and trust, will also be admitted here. Those States are destined to contain in a very near future a very large proportion of the citizens of this great country. To them the boon of these public documents has been not wholly, but largely denied. There is not a volume of these books but that has in some portion of the country a fitting and an appropriate and a useful place in the economy of the Government which our fathers founded. I therefore agree with Milton, that we have as much right to destroy a human life as we have a good book, and I submit that none of these which have been published have been published uselessly or in vain.

I have been myself somewhat surprised at the quality of the bills which have been introduced in the two Houses of Congress, bills which, I undertake in this presence to say, in a multitude of instances no man sitting in this Chamber or in the other House would think for a moment of favoring, bills that encumber the records and occupy the time and confuse the minds of those who come here with serious intent, and this has been done upon a theory not wholly to be condemned, that if Tom or Dick or Harry, or other people more thoughtless than they, think something particularly and unduly absurd ought to be done, he prepares a bill and forwards it to his Representative, and it is put in here, not as having been indorsed by any person who could be elected to the Senate of the United States or to the other House, but as the petition of the nobody who prepares it.

While I do not think it would be fair for a Senator to decline to introduce a bill simply because in his own judgment it were not wise to be passed in the form in which it was presented, I still do think that he ought to vouch to his brother Senators that he believes that in it and around it and about it there is some merit which, if its form should be changed, it would be well to weave into law. And generally, I think it can be said that the form of repression of public speech that is to find expression in exorcising and diminishing what is said and done is not the wise thing. I think the great pressure of this voluminous printing is itself a potent force in curtailing somewhat the exuberance of speech and inducing us all to confine our remarks to those things that in our view will promote the public good.

As is well said by the chairman of this committee, several of these considerations are precipitated upon a section of the bill to which they do not appertain; but I do think that we ought to keep pace with the growing population of the country, with the growing commerce of the country, and with the growing intelligence of the country in the publication of public documents and in the parliamentary history of what occurs here. Thinking that, I rose simply to enter my protest against diminishing at this period of our history the publication of documents which constitute, I believe I may say, the most perfect and complete parliamentary history that the world has ever seen. It does not do to refer us to what is done in Great Britain or France, for not every Frenchman or Briton is a politician, as is true in the United States, at least in some portions of it, Nebraska, for instance [laughter], and, therefore, it seems that we ought to halt.

While I agree entirely that with from 18 to 40 copies of many of these publications within reach of the members of the Senate for their official use, it is idle to continue to furnish them to the committees, I still do not think it is wise, therefore, to discontinue the publication of them.

The honorable Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] was pleased to say that there was not a committee room large enough to hold the accumulated and accumulating volumes that are furnished to the various committees of the Senate. I beg leave to proffer to him for that use the room of the Committee on Enrolled Bills, which is ample for that purpose, for its dome is the sky. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANDERSON. Mr. President, I have no objection to the proposed amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. I think it is better that the words read should be stricken out, but as I have a matter now in hand that will be important in a later stage of the bill, I shall be glad to give it to the Senate.

My colleague on the committee [Mr. HAWLEY] referred to the number of bills introduced at the last Congress. I find that there were introduced during the Fifty-first Congress in the Senate 5,130 bills and 169 joint resolutions, making a total of 5,299 in the Senate. There were introduced in the House 14,033 bills and 298 joint resolutions, making a total of 14,331, or a grand total of about 20,000 bills introduced during one Congress in the two Houses.

I find by referring to the testimony of Mr. Penicks, who is in the Printing Office and has charge of this sort of printing, that the total number of pages of printed matter of these bills was 97,294, different bills and House resolutions. The number of each bill, whether public or private, which has been printed has been 925. That has been by virtue of resolutions of the Senate at different times. We propose in section 56 of the bill (on page 440 of the report it will be found) to reduce that number from 925 to 625 copies of public bills, and of private bills to 250. So that when one considers the large number of bills which are introduced, and the vast amount of paper it takes to print them, the enormous saving by this section alone will be apparent.

I do not agree to the proposition that it will do to leave certain bills unprinted, no matter what their character may be. It may be simply a bill for private relief and not one that is important to the general public. As has been suggested, committees can not consider them nor can there be a proper file kept of the business of the Senate unless these bills are printed. They certainly have been printed in excessive amounts; and this number, as will be shown by the reading of the report, will be ample for all purposes—625 copies of bills of a public character and 250 copies of private bills.

Mr. COCKRELL. I call the attention of the Senator to the statement in relation to the 97,000 pages, that the House Calendar took up 4,261 pages in the first session. The Senate Calendar is not put down here, but necessarily a great many pages of that is included in the statement.

I see the House reprint bills took up 9,247 and the Senate reprint bills 5,162 pages in the first session; in the second session the House reprinted 3,000 and the Senate reprinted 978. That shows that, notwithstanding the number which was then printed, there was a reprint of a very large number of bills, amounting to nearly 18,000 pages. I think that the number probably provided by the Senate report will be sufficient, but I am satisfied the Senator will find that there will be many orders to reprint bills. That will be the result of it.

Mr. MANDERSON. I call the attention of the Senator to the fact that in another section of this bill there is a provision giving the Committee on Printing of either House the power to direct the printing of 300 additional copies of any bill that may be exhausted in the document room.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is true, that is all provided for; but I am simply saying that the enormous saving anticipated will not be realized or materialize, for it is comparatively a very small sum. The additional expense of printing three or four hundred copies of a bill or of all the bills is a very small part of the expenditure. The type has to be set, the paper has to be furnished, the copies to be struck off, and the additional expense of a few hundred copies is not much of a saving. The paper, ink, and presswork are all the saving effected, and that can not amount to much.

Mr. MANDERSON. If the Senator will allow me, I think the proposed reduction of the number of bills printed from 925 to 625 of public bills, and from 925 to 250 of private bills—private bills composing a very large proportion of bills that are presented——

Mr. COCKRELL. But they are very short bills, as a rule.

Mr. MANDERSON. The saving of presswork and the saving of paper will save an enormous amount of money; how much I have not calculated.

Mr. COCKRELL. I know it will save a considerable sum, but it will be a mere bagatelle compared with the whole.

Mr. MANDERSON. But a bagatelle that will run into a great many thousand dollars.

Mr. COCKRELL. The private bills are, as a rule, only one page. The great bulk of the private bills are short bills. The reformatory measures, as they are frequently called, are the long bills.

I understand the chairman of the committee has amended that so that it now reads—I ask him to see if I am correct in it, for I want to make no mistake about it—

SEC. 25. There shall be reserved by the Public Printer from the quota of each Member of Congress and Delegate one copy of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in unstitched form, to be delivered to each Member or Delegate; and there shall be furnished to each standing committee of Congress one copy, which copies for members and committees shall be bound promptly in paper when each semimonthly index shall be issued, and shall be delivered without delay.

Mr. MANDERSON. That is correct.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator from New Hampshire, as I understand, has moved to strike out the remainder of the section.

Mr. MANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. COCKRELL. In that I fully concur, and hope it will be stricken out; but I did not understand from the explanation of the Senator in charge of the bill whether we were to first act upon the amendments suggested by the committee, and then that other Senators should come in with their amendments, or whether we were to amend each section as we went along. I have been going on the supposition that the committee would first offer their amendments, and when they were finished the bill would be open to general amendment. How is that?

Mr. MANDERSON. I think the bill had better be read for committee amendments, but so far as the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire is concerned, two members of the committee, at least—and I think the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] will coincide with us—agree to adopt it as a committee amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 8, section 25, after the word "delay," it is proposed to strike out the remainder of the section, as follows:

And the Public Printer shall supply, at the end of each session, to each standing committee, filing requisition therefor, one set of the permanent RECORD bound in half Russia, with the name of the committee printed on the back.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question now is on the amendment submitted by the chairman of the committee, the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON].

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to ask the Senator from Nebraska a question affecting the matter of the RECORD, and that is, whether or not there is any section in this bill which provides for the total number of copies of the RECORD to be printed, or is that to be found in the details of the bill? Having struck out the provision relating to committees, which, I believe, are forty-five in number, I wish to know whether we have cut off 45 copies of the RECORD.

Mr. HAWLEY. We have cut off 18.

Mr. MANDERSON. We have cut off 18 from the existing law, but we will cut off 45 copies by the change proposed of the RECORDS to be printed under this bill.

Mr. ALLISON. Then there is no separate provision detailing or stating specifically the number of copies of the RECORD that are to be printed?

Mr. MANDERSON. Not in gross amount.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment submitted by the chairman of the committee will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 25, line 6, after the word "which," it is proposed to insert the words "copies for members and committees;" so as to read:

And there shall be furnished to each standing committee of Congress 1 copy, which copies for members and committees shall be bound promptly in paper when each semimonthly index shall be issued, and shall be delivered without delay.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary read section 26, as follows:

SEC. 26. The Public Printer shall cause to be stereotyped all matter when there is a reason to believe that it will be needed a second time.

Mr. COCKRELL. How is that? This is new and gives warrant of law to a practice of the Government Printing Office to stereotype all matter. Do they not do that now?

Mr. MANDERSON. They do that in every instance where they presume the matter will be used again. Take bills and joint resolutions that are printed in bill form. They are never stereotyped, as it is not presumed they will be used again, and so the electrotype process is not used, but for all the reports and public documents generally the matter is electrotyped.

Mr. COCKRELL. Take the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, for example, or the report of any one of the bureaus. Such reports are made to the head of the Department and he transmits them to the President with his report. The report is then transmitted by the President to Congress. Now, I want to know if the type for the printing of that special report is set up each time separately that that report appears in the different documents?

Mr. MANDERSON. No, I understand not. That is a report likely to be printed again. Take, for instance, the pamphlet report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office. That would be electrotyped as to all its matter except the paging, the paging of course would have to be changed, and that matter with the plates would be used for the reprinting. In such a case composition, as I understand from the Public Printer, is never charged a second time unless there is an actual setting up of the type; that is to say, when the type is set and the form electrotyped that electrotype plate is used and composition is not again charged for.

Mr. COCKRELL. Would a document like the President's message be electrotyped?

Mr. MANDERSON. It would be perhaps in the form in which it would go in the executive documents.

Mr. COCKRELL. I mean the annual message of the President.

Mr. MANDERSON. The President's message is somewhat of an exception to the general rule of documents, because, my impression is, that it is set up at the request or order of the President in quarto form. I imagine that that would not be electrotyped, because it would not be again printed in that form, but in the form in which it would go in the messages and documents it would be electrotyped.

Mr. COCKRELL. I wanted to know specifically whether the composition, the setting up of the type in these documents was charged for more than once. I have heard it intimated that it was, and that is the reason I asked the question.

Mr. MANDERSON. I will state, in response to the question of the Senator from Missouri, that on page 23 of the report will be found the testimony of the Public Printer with reference to the matter of stereotyping. The question was asked by Mr. RICHARDSON of the witness:

How much stereotyping do you do in the Government Printing Office?

Mr. PALMER. All of the matter that is set up, where the editions are large, is stereotyped.

Mr. RICHARDSON. How small an edition would you stereotype?

Mr. PALMER. That depends upon what the matter is to be used for. If we have an idea the matter is to be used again in something else, we would stereotype it anyway. It is safe to say that three-fourths of all the matter is stereotyped.

The CHAIRMAN. In making your estimates of cost of printing are there any instances in which the estimate is twice made for composition?

Mr. PALMER. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. If you bring the stereotype plates back after they are once taken from the press, for the purpose of printing a second edition of a work, is there a second charge for composition?

Mr. PALMER. There never has been under my administration, and I presume not under that of my predecessors.

Mr. HAWLEY. Is such second charge for composition made in the case of speeches?

Mr. PALMER. No, sir; unless the type is actually reset.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Is it ever made in any case?

Mr. PALMER. No, sir; composition is not charged for a second time unless, as I said, the type is actually reset.

The Secretary read from section 27 to section 32, inclusive.

Mr. MANDERSON. The second comma in line 2 of section 32 should be stricken out. After the word "operation," in that line, I move to strike out the comma.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PASCO in the chair). That will be the order if there be no objection.

Mr. MANDERSON. I move to insert, after the word "law," in the same line, the words "except those heretofore provided for by law for special purposes." I will send the amendment to the desk.

Mr. HAWLEY. I understand my colleague proposes to allow one of these branch offices to remain independent of the Public Printer.

Mr. MANDERSON. I will explain the purpose of the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "law," in line 2 of section 32, it is proposed to insert "except those heretofore provided for by law for special purposes."

Mr. MANDERSON. This amendment came to me from the Census Office. I submitted it to the chairman of the Committee on the Census [Mr. HALE]. It seems that this is the condition. Under the provision of the census law the Census Office was permitted to use a part of the appropriation in doing printing. Under the operation of that law there was started a small printing office in the Census Bureau. The work of that printing office is nearly completed, but there are still a few bulletins, I understand, which they propose to issue. It hardly seems worth while to place that small printing office under the direction of the Public Printer for the short space of time it is yet to continue, and this amendment is for the purpose of reaching that case.

Mr. COCKRELL. I give notice that I shall at the proper time offer another amendment to except another printing office here, which is of far more importance to the public service than the one the Senator refers to, and which may not possibly be covered by this bill. That is the type and machinery of a very small establishment used in the record and pension division of the War Department. It is used there by the clerks alone. There are no printers there. When a clerk comes to copying a record and finds certain remarks repeated fifty or one hundred times, instead of writing them out and taking a day or two to do it, he just goes down there, sets the type up, and prints it on fifty or seventy-five cards, or as often as may be necessary, and then he goes back and fills up the blanks. They have no printing office there except the material which they purchased and which they use for that purpose. It saves hundreds of clerks and it saves months and months of time in completing the work there.

Mr. MANDERSON. I certainly have no objection to the purpose the Senator has in view, but wish before he prepares the proposed amendment that he would refer to pages 6 and 7 of the last report of the Public Printer, where will be seen a communication from the Secretary of War that bears upon the subject to which the Senator refers.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am not sure but that the amendment which the Senator from Nebraska has moved will cover the establishment to which I referred, because there is a special provision of law which provides for it.

Mr. MANDERSON. Perhaps there is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON.]

The amendment was agreed to.

Sections 33, 34, and 35 were read.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

RECOMITTAL OF A BILL.

Mr. TELLER. I ask the Senator to withhold that motion for a moment.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well.

Mr. TELLER. I ask that Order of Business No. 143 on our Calendar, being the bill (H. R. 9) to define and punish blackmailing, may be recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary. The bill evidently got out of the committee without such attention as it should have received.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be recommitted to the committee in the absence of objection.

TELEGRAPHIC CABLE TO HONOLULU.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed, as follows:

To the Senate of the United States:

In reply to a resolution of the Senate of the 27th ultimo, requesting the President to advise the Senate as to what action, if any, has been taken * * * to cause careful soundings to be made between San Francisco, Cal., and Honolulu * * * for the purpose of determining the practicability of laying a telegraphic cable between those two points, or between any point on the Pacific coast and the Kingdom of the Hawaiian Islands, I inclose herewith a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, dated January 30, 1892.

BENJ. HARRISON.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, February 2, 1892.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. ALLISON. I now renew my motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, February 3, 1892, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate February 2, 1892.

PROMOTIONS IN THE ARMY.

Second Lieut. Frank De W. Ramsey, Ninth Infantry, to be first lieutenant, January 25, 1892, vice Webster, Second Infantry, appointed regimental quartermaster.

PROMOTION IN MARINE HOSPITAL SERVICE.

Assistant Surg. George T. Vaughan, of Virginia, to be passed assistant surgeon in the Marine Hospital Service of the United States.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, February 2, 1892.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

HARBOR OF REFUGE, DELAWARE BAY.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a letter from the Chief of Engineers, together with a copy of a report of a commission of officers of the Corps of Engineers of an examination, with project and estimate of cost of construction, for a harbor of refuge suitable for deep-draft vessels near the mouth of Delaware Bay; which was referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

THE MILITIA.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting an abstract of the organized and unorganized militia forces of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on the Militia.

GENERAL INCORPORATION LAW OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a bill (H. R. 2785) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend the general incorporation law of the District of Columbia, approved May 17, 1882," with an amendment of the Senate thereto.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the House to consider that bill now and to agree to the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The amendment will be read, after which the Chair will ask if there be objection.

The Senate amendment was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the bill from the House of Representatives (H. R. 2785), an act to amend an act entitled "An act to amend the general incorporation law of the District of Columbia," etc., do pass with the following amendment:

After line 19, insert: "Section 3. Congress may at any time alter, amend, or repeal this act."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina that the Senate amendment be now concurred in?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House Senate bills of the following titles; which were severally referred as indicated below:

A bill (S. 53) to reimburse certain persons who expended moneys and furnished services and supplies in repelling invasions and suppressing Indian hostilities within the territorial limits of the present State of Nevada—to the Committee on War Claims.

A bill (S. 56) for the erection of a public building at Reno, State of Nevada—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

A bill (S. 80) providing for the completion of the public building in the city of Pensacola, Fla., as originally designed—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

A bill (S. 211) for the relief of the sureties of Dennis Murphy—to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (S. 821) to provide for a term of the circuit and district court at Littleton, N. H.—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

A bill (S. 1134) for the relief of purchasers of land within the limits of the Umatilla Indian Reservation—to the Committee on Public Lands.

A bill (S. 1270) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Kansas City, in the State of Kansas—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

A bill (S. 1379) to provide for a pension for Obe Sutherland, late a teamster in the Quartermaster's Department of the United States volunteer army—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

A bill (S. 1503) to establish a first-order light-house on North Head, Cape Disappointment, in the State of Washington—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. STAHLNECKER, for one week, on account of important business.

To Mr. SANFORD, indefinitely, on account of important business.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MORSE] rises, as the Chair understands, to a question of privilege. He will state it.

Mr. MORSE. I rise to a personal explanation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. Speaker, a most extraordinary proceeding was enacted in this House by my colleague [Mr. HOAR] on yesterday, of which I deem it my duty to take further notice. I claim that this young gentleman violated the proprieties that should obtain among gentlemen. Who gave him my manuscript, and by what authority does he carry it away from the Public Printing Office? Some of the oldest members of this House tell me that this proceeding of this young gentleman is without precedent in the history of this body. The reports of the stenographers are undoubtedly the property of this House; but my manuscript is undoubtedly my property if it is anybody's, and I deny the right of the gentleman from Massachusetts to remove Government property or documents or my manuscript from the Public Printing Office, and bring it into this House for exhibition, or to carry it around in his pocket.

The facts in regard to this matter are not as explicitly set forth in my hasty explanation of yesterday as I deem proper. The exact truth is this: My remarks substantially as delivered were in manuscript form before they were delivered (a very common thing in this House), and I so informed the stenographers before speaking. And I understand my remarks were not taken down at all, but only the interruptions of the young gentleman from Massachusetts, "applause," etc., and the changes incident thereto; and when he said he held in his hand the stenographer's report of my speech he said what was absolutely false and untrue. He had and there was no report beyond what I have stated. At the close of my speech a messenger came to my desk for the manuscript. At a later hour I conferred with the assistant stenographer as to where the applause which occurred on this side and interruptions of the gentleman from Massachusetts came in, with additional remarks——

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker, the disorder is so great we can not tell what is transpiring.

The SPEAKER. The House will please be in order.

Mr. BOUTELLE. There are indications that this may be a matter of interest to the House of Representatives.

Mr. ANDREW. Oh, I think not. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is making a personal explanation to the House, and is entitled to order.

Mr. MORSE. At a later hour, Mr. Speaker, I conferred with the assistant stenographer as to where the interruptions of the gentleman from Massachusetts came in, with additional remarks by me incident thereto that were not in my manuscript. I also conferred with him as to where the applause came in that occurred on this side during the delivery of my speech, which, of course, was not in the manuscript. I do not deny having availed myself of the privilege allowed every member of this House from time immemorial to revise his speech and make slight and unimportant changes thereto.

Now, Mr. Speaker, that is all the basis there is for the personal and abusive attack which the gentleman from Massachusetts saw fit to make upon me here upon the floor of this House on yesterday.

But, Mr. Speaker, do not let the House be deceived. All this is not intended for you, but it is intended by my colleague [Mr. HOAR] for home consumption. If you could believe the accounts furnished the Boston Globe of his exploits here you would have a right to suppose that this young man was to indicate the economic and financial policy of his party on this floor, and that you, Mr. Speaker, and Mr. HOLMAN, Mr. MCMILLIN, Mr. SPRINGER, Mr. HATCH, Mr. BLOUNT, Mr. DOCKERY, Governor MCCREARY, and others, men who were in public life long before this young gentleman was born, to use a slang expression, "were not in it."

Why, I have in my hand a copy of the Boston Globe which contains half a column describing exactly fifteen words by the RECORD that the young man uttered on this floor last Friday. Yesterday's speech will probably take two columns in the Boston Globe. It says that Mr. HOAR'S interruption of my speech of last Friday (consisting, as I have said, of fifteen words) "was followed by prolonged and great applause on both sides of the House." [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] That, Mr. Speaker, is not in the RECORD. There was no applause on either side of the House; that was intended for home consumption, where it will do the gentleman more good than in the RECORD.

Mr. Speaker, I fear you do not appreciate this young gentleman from Massachusetts. Only think of it. This young man who was to indicate the economic and financial policy of the Democratic party and is believed now to be doing so by his admiring constituents at home; this young gentleman who wept over the defeat of his candidate for Speaker—only think of it, Mr. Speaker—he was placed by you on a committee that never had a meeting during the Fifty-first Congress except to elect a clerk! That was the "unkindest cut of all."

But Mr. HOAR is investigating the "sweating system" now, and every committee meeting and every act of his is noted at length in the columns of the Boston Globe. He will know more about the "sweating system" next autumn; he will have his heaviest perspiration when he receives the returns from the old Fifth district. If he has tears to shed he should save them and "prepare to shed them" then. [Laughter on the Republican side.] I think the presence of this young gentleman, who, I repeat, has deliberately and with malice (and not in the heat of any debate)—he has, I say, violated the proprieties that obtain among gentlemen. The young man is an accident here, and I think the accident is not likely to occur again in Gen. Banks's old district. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HOAR. Mr. Speaker, I think that the gentleman from Massachusetts has been advertised enough. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. DOLLIVER. Which "gentleman from Massachusetts?" [Laughter on the Republican side.]

RULES.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I call up for further consideration the report of the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the pending amendment, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BURROWS moves to amend by adding to the pending paragraph the following:

"3. On the demand of any member, or at the suggestion of the Speaker, before the second roll call is entered upon, the names of members (sufficient to make a quorum) in the Hall of the House who do not vote, shall be noted by the Clerk and recorded in the Journal, and reported to the Speaker with the names of the members voting, and be counted and announced in determining the presence of a quorum to do business."

Mr. REED. I suggest that by unanimous consent the yea and nay vote be omitted. The result desired on this side—that is, to show that the minority in the present Congress are willing to present the same system of rules that they had when they were in the majority in the Fifty-first Congress—can be reached by a vote upon the substitute offered on the part of the minority, just as well as by having a roll call upon this amendment; and in this way we may save half an hour of the time of the House, because I have no reason to suppose that this amendment will carry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] asks unanimous consent that the vote by which the yeas and nays were ordered be reconsidered. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the roll call will be dispensed with. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] which has just been read by the Clerk.

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. REED. I desire to offer as an additional clause the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whenever a quorum fails to vote on any question, and objection is made, there shall be a call of the House, and the yeas and nays on the pending question shall at the same time be ordered. The Clerk shall call the roll, and each member as he answers to his name, or is brought before the House under the proceedings of the call of the House, shall vote on the pending question. If those voting on the question and those who are present and decline to vote, shall together make a majority of the House, the Speaker shall declare that a quorum is constituted, and the pending question shall be decided as the majority of those voting shall appear.

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, I desire that the House may understand the amendment which has been offered. It was found in the last Congress, was found in previous Congresses, and perhaps will continue to be found, that the ordinary rules which existed for some time have not sufficient stringency to cause the presence of a quorum and induce action by a quorum when there is a desire on the part of some members to stay out. The process under the rules as proposed here for adoption by the House requires that in such cases the proceedings under the call shall be discontinued before the business which was under consideration by the House shall go on. This gives an opportunity for the reopening of the doors and the disappearance of members. Whether we ought to exercise our constitutional power of compelling the attendance of members or not, is something for the House to consider; but if we do intend to exercise that power, then we ought to exercise it effectually.

I have accordingly proposed an amendment which was originally suggested by Mr. Tucker of Virginia, a member of the Democratic party, and at that time a member of this House—an amendment which received then the full and enthusiastic support of the present chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means [Mr. SPRINGER], and which I have no doubt will receive his support now. It provides that whenever it is ascertained that no quorum is present, there shall be a call of the House, and at the same time the yeas and nays shall be regarded as pending; and as each member is brought into the presence of the House, when he visibly appears before it, he shall be offered an opportunity to vote, and shall by the rules of the House be required to vote. But if he does not vote, his presence shall then be counted to make a part of a quorum.

It will be perceived that this does away with every one of those objections which have been suggested as to the power given to the Speaker, or, as I should say, as to the duty imposed upon him. It brings the member directly before the House; and there is no possibility of even such a mistake as happened the other day in the case of the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAINES], who was not only recorded as voting on the yeas and nays when he was in New York, but was recorded upon the wrong side.

This frees it from all criticism of that kind, and I am unable to see how a House that is in earnest in its work can refrain from adopting the amendment; because it has the very highest Democratic sanction, namely, the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means of the present House, a distinguished Democratic member of Congress from Virginia, and also the sanction of the present Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN]. It did not at the time have mine, but that has been changed. [Laughter.]

Mr. MOORE. Let us have the amendment reported.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, I hardly think that this matter should go to a vote without a statement of the result that would necessarily flow from it if adopted, and which to my mind are sufficient reasons why it should not be adopted.

The effect of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Maine would be to have legislative action taken while the House was yet closed, and possibly while members to be counted were yet under arrest. That, it seems to me, would be the inevitable consequence; legislation and the roll call would be going on behind closed doors, and while a call of the House was in progress.

A man is caught and held while you count him, and that is called "legislative action." Mr. Speaker, that is the action taken by the last Congress intensified. In the last Congress a distinguished gentleman who did not agree to this kind of proceeding refused, and very properly refused, to be locked up here and kept locked up.

The country knows very well, Mr. Speaker, that when that proceeding was instituted, it had always theretofore been the custom that during a call of the House members who were present were permitted to go out of the Hall on their parole of honor that they would return, the doors being closed at the time. On this occasion in the last Congress, when this proceeding was being conducted, the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. KILGORE] determined that he would enforce that rule or custom, and did it, and properly.

Mr. REED. And violated the rule.

Mr. McMILLIN. And that custom had always prevailed in all calls of the House before that time.

Mr. REED. I hope the gentleman from Tennessee will not shift from rule to custom. The rule required the doors to be closed. The gentleman from Texas kicked the door open.

Mr. McMILLIN. The doors had always been closed but not locked. On the occasion to which I refer the doors were not only closed but locked, and the gentleman from Texas determined that as far as he was concerned there should be a return to the old custom.

Mr. REED. It was a violation of the rule. The rule required that the doors should be closed. All I ask the gentleman is not to make confusion between the rule and custom, and not to pass from one to the other of them, so that the House may not inadvertently get an impression that he is talking of the same thing, when they are very different from each other.

Mr. McMILLIN. Then I will state to the gentleman from Maine so that there can be no confusion, that it has been the custom since the organization of the Government to permit members during a call of the House to go in and out of the Hall at their will, simply giving their word of honor that they would return. The gentleman from Texas enforced that custom by breaking open the door which prevented him from exercising that privilege, and he did it right. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, in reply to what the gentleman from Maine has stated, I may be permitted to say—as this amendment contemplates that the doors shall be closed and the members required to legislate behind closed doors, and with force in actual application upon them to detain them here—that the man who would suffer himself to be forced to legislate for this country under such circumstances would not deserve to be a custodian of freedom, but ought to be put in the penitentiary and locked up himself. [Applause on the Democratic side.] That is the contention that I make on the question. And I hope, as one of the majority of this House, that the time will never come when the representatives of the people here will legislate, or pretend to legislate, behind locked doors and under coercion.

Mr. KILGORE. Will the gentleman from Tennessee yield to me for one moment?

Mr. McMILLIN. Certainly.

Mr. KILGORE. I simply wish to say, by way of explanation in connection with the remarks of the gentleman from Tennessee, that on the occasion referred to there was a call of the House, and a quorum had appeared and answered. I had answered to my name, and I assumed then, as I assume now, that on that occasion the Speaker had no authority to direct the closing of the doors for all time to keep me and other members in the House that he might count us to make a quorum after I had answered to my name and a quorum was found to be present. Hence the door of the House was forced open.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Will the gentleman from Tennessee permit me to ask him a question? I wish to ask if the gentleman from Tennessee understands the rule of the House to be that the doors shall be closed for the purpose of enabling people to pass through, in and out? [Laughter.]

Mr. McMILLIN. I would state in reply——

Mr. BOUTELLE. That is what I would like, a reply.

Mr. McMILLIN. That the door is closed for the purpose of enabling the officers of the House to find who is in the House and who are absent, and to send for them, but not to force action under lock or force. Of course the object of closing doors is not usually to facilitate exit. [Laughter.] But the gentleman knows full well that it has always been the custom to construe that rule as allowing members to go in and out after leaving their names with some officer of the House under a declaration that it was their purpose to return. He knows that as well as I do. And I will not be shifted from the point that is before the House actually by being interrogated in this indirect manner.

Mr. MILLS rose.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] is recognized.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I hope the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN] will answer my question. It is a very——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Well, I know, but he ought to answer a simple question directly bearing upon the subject-matter of his statement.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] has the floor.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, I can not give the gentleman understanding. [Laughter].

Mr. BOUTELLE. I would like to ask the gentleman if he understands himself that a rule providing for the closing of the doors is for the purpose of allowing gentlemen to pass in and out?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] has been recognized.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Speaker, the pending amendment, as I understand it, though I could not hear it very distinctly when it was read, is substantially an amendment offered by Mr. Tucker in a former Congress. It is a fact, Mr. Speaker, that that amendment was provoked by the long and persistent filibustering on the part of our friends on the other side of the House. And notwithstanding this side of the House had been laboring for a long time to reach a conclusion, and notwithstanding the deservedly great influence of Mr. Tucker in this House, he being recognized as one of the ablest men in the nation, one of the greatest lawyers and a man of great personal influence with everyone with whom he came in contact, yet I do not recall another supporter of the proposition on that floor, except the present chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, and perhaps a few others. But it shows that the administration of this House was so thoroughly in accord with the true principles of Democracy that even as great a man as John Randolph Tucker could not induce them, under great provocation, to depart from a fundamental principle of government.

The vote of a Representative is a weapon placed in his hands by his constituents to protect, guard, and defend their rights. It is a power not to be taken from him, and it is within his discretion to sit within a legislative assembly, where their rights are imperiled, and use it or not use it, as he may think he can best defend and guard the interests committed to him. A distinguished illustration of this was the case of old Nathaniel Macon, who sat where you now sit, Mr. Speaker, and when a two-thirds vote was required to submit an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and that two-thirds could only be procured by his vote, when there was a rule of the House providing that the Speaker of the House of Representatives should not vote, he said the question whether he should vote or not belonged to him and his constituents, and not to the House of Representatives. He did vote, in defiance of the rules of the House, the resolution was passed, and the amendment was submitted to the people of the United States.

Another distinguished instance in the history of this country was that of the venerable John Quincy Adams, who, after he had been President of the United States, sitting in the old hall of the House, refused to vote because he believed he could best vindicate the rights of his people by withholding that power, and that he alone was to be the judge. He alone was responsible for the trust committed by his constituents. He sat still, in defiance of the vote of this entire House, and for two days refused to vote, notwithstanding the House commanded him to vote. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And after this House had played with the subject for two days, to see if they could bring one refractory American citizen to the bar and compel him to surrender the high trust with which he had been invested, then like children that had been playing with toys, they laid down the subject and dismissed it.

This House, sir, has no right to take from a Representative the power with which he has been invested under a free government to guard and protect and secure the rights of his constituents. If I feel that I can best guard those rights by sitting still and refusing to make a quorum in a legislative assembly that I believe is going to trample on those rights, the sacred duty that I bear to those who have intrusted it to me will compel me to sit in my chair and refuse to obey the mandates of this House. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I am a Democrat, sir. [Renewed applause.] I go back to the fundamental principles of this Government, and our fathers have over and over again taught us that you can only secure the liberties of the people by frequently going back and recurring to them.

What is the fundamental truth that underlies the whole system of our Government? It is that this is a government not of force but of consent. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Its power comes from the will of the people. Are you going to compel the people to vote? I have seen that discussed and advocated by schemers and dreamers, that you should make a law compelling every voter in the land to go to the ballot box and vote. You have the same right to do that as you have to compel a Representative to vote against the interest of his people. The answer to that is old-fashioned Jeffersonian Democracy; the government by the consent of the people, and the legislation of the country by the consent of the representatives. [Applause.]

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, I desire to divest this debate as much as possible from the partisan character which some gentlemen here seem desirous to give it. [Derisive laughter on the Democratic side.] And as I am proposing a Democratic amendment, supported by a first-rate Democratic authority, I am quite sure that the House will not permit itself to be lashed into a state of mind, because there is nothing more desirable than that we should approach these subjects without feeling and without fervor. If this were a Congress where a fight was going on, as in the last Congress, I should feel like pardoning something to the spirit if liberty, as I have always felt about the last Congress. I have never been disposed to be cross about what gentlemen have said and the outcries which people have made, because that was an occasion when there was a political conflict, and striking sometimes happened below the belt—not on our side, of course, because we were in the majority. [Laughter.]

But this is a Congress where the Democracy are 3 to 1; hence they can afford to approach this question without anything in the nature of ill temper. They can afford to require what is for the good of the country. I would not have a single member of that party suppose that what I have proposed is a Republican measure upon which we have any patent upon which the Democratic party has no right to infringe.

On page 575 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, second session of Forty-sixth Congress, volume 10, I read what Mr. Tucker of Virginia said on proposing this identical amendment:

A majority of the members of this House if present constitute a quorum to do business. The Constitution does not say that a majority voting shall constitute a quorum, but that a majority of the House shall constitute a quorum to do business; and the practice of the English Parliament, from which most of our rules upon this subject have been taken, is that whenever the House of Commons meets the Speaker counts the members who are present and announces that a quorum is present if there is a sufficient number; so that the Speaker of the House of Commons may, as the Speaker here, by ocular demonstration become satisfied that there is a quorum present. And the purpose of this amendment is not to make any member vote when he does not choose to vote—

And that is an answer to the objection of the gentleman from Texas—

but to have a call of the House when a quorum is disclosed as not present upon a division on a pending question; and then, as each member's name is called and he answers to his name, he is noted as present. He may vote or not, as he pleases. If he does not answer to his name the Sergeant-at-Arms under the call is sent for him; if he is in the House he is brought to the bar, and by ocular demonstration is proved to be present. And thus we may have an ascertained quorum of the House though there may not be a quorum voting.

The rest of Mr. Tucker's remarks are valuable reading, like everything else he said in this House.

I now turn to the remarks of the honorable gentleman who now so worthily leads the House. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman from Michigan has stated that this rule is unconstitutional and partisan in its character. In my judgment—

Mark the words—

In my judgment, Mr. Chairman, it is neither. One of the greatest absurdities imaginable to me is this: it is within the power of a less number of members than a quorum of this House to issue a mandate and send it to the Pacific coast, to the far-off State of Oregon, to bring in a member to this body, and when we have got him here at an expense of weeks of time and thousands of dollars, the man is not here at last unless he voluntarily opens his mouth and says "I am here"—and votes "ay" or "no" on the pending question. I say there can be no greater absurdity than to presume our fathers made a Constitution and gave that power to a less number than a quorum, and after we have exhausted it the man was not here at last unless he chose to be. He did not choose to be here or we would not have sent for him, and when he is brought here he is not here unless he chooses to be. What an absurdity.

[Laughter.]

Now, I do not, of course, charge that the gentleman from Illinois, chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, entertains that opinion now. I read it to the House upon account of its inherent beauty, and to have the continued weight of his authority.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Maine has expired.

Mr. REED. I ask the House to give me a little more time, so that I may read another extract.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Maine be extended five minutes.

Mr. MILLS. I also request that the time of the gentleman may be extended.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request that the time of the gentleman from Maine be extended for five minutes? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, I repeat that I did not in the least quote this language of the gentleman from Illinois without his consent as an authority, but I quoted it on account of the good sense there is in it, and it has the approval, as I have had the honor repeatedly to say in this House, of every supreme court of every State, and of every judge of every supreme court that has passed upon the question.

Mr. HEMPHILL. What did the House do with that?

Mr. REED. It was withdrawn. I will come to that later. Here is the statement of another gentleman, Mr. BLACKBURN of Kentucky, and I would like special attention to this language, because it covers more than the others:

Does not the gentleman from Ohio know that in the present existing rules of this House, as well as that proposed revision which he, as a very efficient member of the Committee on Rules, has submitted for your adoption, supplemented and supported by parliamentary law from the older countries and also by practice both in England and America, always and everywhere the power has been recognized and vested in the Speaker or presiding officer to make an actual count of the persons present?

Mark the words "always and everywhere."

I will read from Cushing's Digest of Parliamentary Law, accepted the world over as authority, in which it is provided—

"If, therefore, it appears upon division, or if notice is taken by any member, that a quorum is not present, it then becomes the immediate duty of the presiding officer to count the members, and if they do not amount to a quorum to suspend all further proceedings."

That is the authority laid down by Mr. Cushing. The present rule so recognizes it, and makes it the Speaker's duty. The proposed rule of the House, if amended as proposed by the gentleman from Virginia, instead of consolidating power in the hands of one man, takes it from him, and requires a call of the House to be had, and only those persons present noted that either respond to their names upon the call of the roll, or appear at the bar of the House in the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. Will the gentleman from Maine allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. REED. With pleasure.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. Is it not a fact that the volume which you hold in your hand also contains a statement that Mr. Garfield of Ohio arose and appealed to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Tucker] to withdraw his proposition, because it would receive the unanimous opposition of that side of the House; and that Mr. Tucker did withdraw it, and there was no vote on the amendment?

Mr. REED. That is not quite accurate, but it is substantially so. It was withdrawn, as I was about to state when the gentleman from Mississippi thought he could state it better than I could.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. Not at all.

Mr. REED. I was about to state to the House that that amendment was withdrawn. I had promised the House, before the gentleman from Mississippi arose, that I would state what was done with it. It was withdrawn for the very simple reason, I think, that the Democratic party were afraid they would not stay in power so long as they have stayed, and the Republican party was very much afraid that the Democratic party would undertake to repeal what was known as "war legislation;" and they desired to have an opportunity to prevent it. Both parties, being desirous at that time of not doing any business, refused to adopt this rule.

Now, if this House wants to occupy the attitude of not doing any business, the rule reported by the committee is one way of not doing business; but if they desire to do business, that rule proposed by Mr. Tucker is one of the ways in which they could do it. I believe it is for the general interest of this country that this House shall be equipped to do business as the Constitution says it shall. I urge it while in the minority as earnestly as I should in the majority, if my views had been called for at the time that course was suggested.

Now, let me say one word in reference to the adoption of the rules of the Fifty-first Congress. Before they were adopted there were Republicans who said, "Do you not remember that in adopting these rules you are adopting rules when three times to one the House is Democratic; and if you place the power where you propose to do they will follow." I stated that I wanted them to follow it whenever in the majority of this House, and that I wanted them to have the power the people intended to give them. I believe that is the true way to look on this; and I believe also that if this proposed rule was adopted all filibustering would end except that which we all agree is legitimate, namely, that by which time is secured for debate instead of being wasted in roll calls.

If we adopt that rule we shall get back to the principles of the fathers.

Mr. BYNUM. Will the gentleman answer a question?

Mr. REED. With pleasure.

Mr. BYNUM. Will he tell us why it was, then, that in the different Congresses in which he was in a minority he was always found among the filibusters?

Mr. REED. Simply because I exercised the power that was given me by the House; and, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] has suggested, it may be done again. [Laughter.] Do you not see that if the House gives permission for piracy some gentleman may choose to go into that interesting and lucrative business? [Laughter.]

Mr. BYNUM. That is, you want the rule to keep you from being bad? [Laughter.]

Mr. REED. I want it not only to keep me from being bad (for I shall need it), but also to keep a good many other gentlemen from being bad who will need it a good deal more. [Laughter.]

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Speaker, I owe a debt of gratitude to my friend from Maine [Mr. REED] for correcting my memory in reference to what the resolution or the amendment was that was offered in a former Congress by my friend from Virginia, and I apologize to Mr. Tucker for having inadvertently misstated the entire scope of his amendment. He was and is one of the greatest, one of the justest, and, altogether, one of the most lovable men I have ever known; a man who would not do injustice or wrong to any person living, and I am glad to know that he did not contend for the power in this House to compel a refractory member to vote against his convictions.

To return to the question which my friend from Maine [Mr. REED] discusses, about the power of the Speaker to count members present in order to make a quorum, and to the authorities which he cites, the acts and decisions of the Legislative Assemblies of the various States, my friend knows, because he is an able lawyer, that the power of this body is not like the power of the legislative bodies existing under the constitutions of the States of this Union. This House has no power except that which is granted to it as a delegated body, while on the other hand the Legislatures of the various States have the power to do whatever they choose to do that is not actually forbidden to them under the State constitutions. What power has this House? Just whatever power the Constitution of the United States gives it.

It is said that the Constitution gives the House the power to make rules. It does; but the power to make rules must be construed and exercised with reference to every other provision contained in the Constitution. This House can punish its members, but it can not try them by court-martial. There are many things that it can not do, and whatever power is vested in it is and must be limited by the prohibitions contained in the other parts of the Constitution. This House may make rules, certainly; and it has made rules. What are those rules, and what has been the construction of them by the judges who have sat where you now sit, Mr. Speaker? From Speaker Muhlenburg down to yourself there has never been a Speaker in that Chair, except one, who has ever claimed that he had the right to supplement the count ordained by the Constitution, and to determine for himself who was present and voting.

A distinguished citizen of the gentleman's own State sat there in the Forty-third Congress for more than seventy hours and resisted the pressure of almost a two-thirds majority in this House, angry, warlike, led by the ablest and bravest men of the Republican party, threatening him, beseeching him, urging him to count as present men that he saw before him but who had not voted upon the record. He replied to them that he had no power to add to the record; that the record must speak for itself.

Mr. Speaker, there are three kinds of votes recognized by our parliamentary rules in this House. One is a vote taken by the Speaker, counted by him; another is a vote counted by the House itself; and the third is a vote counted and ascertained by the written record. When the Speaker puts a question to this House he decides the result first by the sound. If he doubts or if the accuracy of his decision is challenged he may call for a division, or any member of the House may rise and demand a division, and then the Speaker counts again. When he announces the result of that vote his count is finished. If the House is still unsatisfied, then a count is made by the House itself, one member on each side taking his place as a teller and counting the members as they pass. Then the result is announced, a result ascertained and announced by the House itself, and not by the Speaker.

But there is still a further appeal to the court of last resort, to that court beyond which there is no appeal, to that court whose judgment can not be supplemented by parol evidence, whose written record can not be contradicted. That court the Constitution of the United States itself provides for, and any one-fifth of the members present may call for that record vote. When that vote is taken by the record it is final and conclusive, and the Speaker can not add to it. If he can add to it then the judgment itself is worthless. What court is there in the United States or anywhere else that would permit the parol evidence of a sheriff or any other officer to add to the judgment of the tribunal? The record speaks for itself, and it imports absolute verity, and can not be questioned when it is the record of a court of last resort.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Maine has called the attention of the House to the position which I took upon the Tucker resolution in the Forty-sixth Congress. He has endeavored to show that my position at this time is entirely inconsistent with the position I then held. I regret that the gentleman from Maine did not at the same time call the attention of the House to the position which he took when the Tucker amendment was pending.

A gentleman from Kentucky, a member at that time, Mr. Phister, had made some remarks in favor of the Tucker rule. The gentleman from Maine then proceeded to reply as follows:

> Mr. Chairman, if it was my purpose to reply to the gentleman who has just taken his seat [Mr. Phister], it seems to me that it would be a suitable and proper reply to say to him that the constitutional idea of a quorum is not the presence of a majority of the members of the House, but a majority of the members present and participating in the business of the House. It is not the visible presence of members but their judgments and votes that the Constitution calls for.

This speech, I desire to remark, Mr. Speaker, is to be found on page 578 of volume 10 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, from which the gentleman himself read. Proceeding to discuss this proposition still further, he said:

> I prefer, however, in the short time which I have, to discuss this question upon a different basis. This privilege—

That is to say, the privilege of breaking a quorum by refusing to vote, which was then under consideration—

> This privilege, which the minority of the House at the last session availed itself of, is a privilege which every minority has availed itself of since the foundation of this Government.

The minority referred to there by the gentleman was the minority of the Republicans in the Forty-fifth Congress.

Mr. REED. That could hardly have been the main idea, because it speaks of minorities ever since the foundation of the Constitution. That has not always been Republican.

Mr. SPRINGER. You were referring to the minority in that Congress. This was the first session of the Forty-sixth Congress.

But let me continue this extract:

> By pure accident, in looking over an index of the RECORD this morning, I found the account of a resolution, which was drawn up by a distinguished member of this House from Massachusetts [Mr. Butler], to cause the arrest of a distinguished member from Pennsylvania [Mr. Randall] for not voting. I believe, however, nothing ever came of that resolution.
>
> Now, what is the practical upshot of the present practice? It is that the members of the minority of this House upon great occasions demand that every bill which is passed shall receive the absolute vote of a majority of the members elected. They do this in the face and eyes of the country. If they demand upon any frivolous occasion that there shall be such an extraordinary vote as that, they do it subject to the censure of the people of this land. This practice has hitherto kept this House in proper condition upon this subject, so that there has been no improper impeding of the public business.
>
> It is a valuable privilege for the country that the minority shall have the right by this extraordinary mode of proceeding to call the attention of the country to measures which a party in a moment of madness and of party feeling is endeavoring to enforce upon the citizens of this land. And it works equally well with regard to all parties, for all parties have their times when they need to be checked, so that they may receive the opinions of the people who are their constituents and who are interested in the results of their legislation.
> I say that, as a practical matter, the results hitherto throughout all our history have justified the construction which those upon this side of the House have put upon this matter, and which has been put equally by members of the other side in times past. I must say that I am glad to see that this question is being discussed not by divisions of party, but that gentlemen are taking views upon it with reference to its whole bearing, past and future, as well as present.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. REILLY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois be permitted to proceed for five minutes longer.

There was no objection.

Mr. SPRINGER. When, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Maine called the attention of the House to my inconsistency at the time to which he refers, and with reference to the speech I made on that occasion, he entirely left out of view the importance of his persuasive argument and its influence upon me after I had submitted the remarks in question. [Laughter.] He assumed that what he was saying would have no weight, I presume, with anyone; but I must be permitted to assure the distinguished gentleman from Maine that his argument had a powerful effect on my mind at least.

I have not, so far as the proposition is concerned, changed my mind in reference to obtaining a quorum where the yea-and-nay vote is not required. That fact was not called to my attention at the time I made the remarks to which he has referred, nor on the day the rule was discussed. But afterwards it was called to my attention (and the facts brought out in reference to a yea-and-nay vote as required by the Constitution on the demand of one-fifth of the members present), that when it was to be done under the Constitution that record so made would seem to be the only constitutional evidence of those who were present and voting; and those voting in the affirmative and negative were to determine, as the Constitution requires, whether the bill had received the necessary two-thirds vote to override the Presidential veto. When that was called to my attention I conceded the weight of the argument, and I coincided with the view, which was general on this side of the House, that the proposition should not be pressed, and subsequently it was withdrawn by Mr. Tucker.

Mr. REED. Where is the provision in the Constitution requiring that a quorum shall vote?

Mr. SPRINGER. I had reference to that provision of the Constitution which requires a vote of two-thirds of the members present to override a Presidential veto.

Mr. REED. But how do you know that it means two-thirds of a majority? That is the question; I hope the gentleman will not beg it.

Mr. SPRINGER. The Constitution fixes the majority which is required to pass a bill over the Presidential veto in these words:

But in all cases the votes of both Houses shall be determined by yeas and nays——

Mr. REED. But that is not a quorum.

Mr. SPRINGER (continuing)— and the names of the members for and against the bill shall be entered on the Journal of each House respectively.

A number less than a quorum has no power, except to adjourn from day to day and to compel the attendance of absent members. Hence, the passage of a bill requires a quorum to be present. The names so entered upon the Journal are the only evidence that can be presented as to whether the majority required by the Constitution had voted upon the measure or not.

Mr. REED. The only evidence is that there was a two-thirds vote in its favor. But the question of a quorum is not presented in that connection.

Mr. SPRINGER. The House, or the Speaker of the House, its presiding officer, will take cognizance of the fact whether or not a quorum was present. The Chair will of necessity take cognizance of that fact. It is a fluctuating number, depending, of course, on the number of members elected to that particular House.

Mr. REED. But the Constitution does not require a quorum to vote. It only requires that those who vote shall vote by yea and nay; that is all.

Mr. SPRINGER. The Constitution requires that a quorum shall be present to do business.

Mr. REED. Present, yes.

Mr. SPRINGER. And in the absence of a quorum nothing can be done except send for absent members and adjourn from day to day.

Mr. REED. Yes, in the absence of a quorum.

Mr. SPRINGER. Though a quorum of the House is always presumed to be present when business is being done.

Mr. REED. But if a quorum is present, is it necessary that they should all vote in order to pass a bill over the President's veto? Does the gentleman hold that to be true?

Mr. SPRINGER. I do. A yea-and-nay vote must be taken under the Constitution, and that yea-and-nay vote must show that two-thirds of a quorum of the House have voted on that question or that bill would not pass.

Mr. REED. That is begging the question.

Mr. SPRINGER. I think not; and that yea-and-nay vote is to be the only record evidence of the fact as to whether the bill passed.

Mr. REED. But the Constitution says that it shall simply be evidence of the vote.

Mr. SPRINGER. And the vote is evidence that the bill passes.

Mr. REED. But it is not the evidence of a quorum.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the gentleman permit me to make a suggestion? I do it merely in the interest of saving time. Would it not be well, in order to stop this controversy between the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] and the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED], that the gentleman from Illinois adopt the speech made years ago by the gentleman from Maine and the gentleman from Maine adopt the speech made by the gentleman from Illinois. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPRINGER. I will accept that.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the House to the fact that the doctrine of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] is simple disunion, pure and unadulterated. [Derisive laughter on the Democratic side.] It was the purpose of the Constitution to constitute a legislative body. It was the purpose of the Constitution to guaranty the right of every Congressional district of this country to have, through the Representatives of every other district of this country, the opinion of every district in the country upon every question that was brought before this country in legislation. The doctrine of the gentleman from Texas is that the members of this House are responsible to their constituents alone, to the inhabitants of their districts, and them only, for their acts. That when members take the oath to support the Constitution of the United States; when they take the oath to obey the laws of the United States; when they take their seats here and take the oath to obey the rules of this House, that it has no significance; that the members of this House individually are under no obligations to the other members of this House. This simply means disorganization and disunion.

The Constitution provides that this House shall be constituted in a certain way for legislation for the whole country, and that the members of this House shall express their opinion by their vote. That is the practical significance and meaning of every provision of the Constitution touching legislation; while the doctrine of some gentlemen on the other side of this House, and the doctrine taught by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS], and acted upon in the last Congress by the minority, was that each man, regardless of the Constitution, regardless of his oath, regardless of the laws of the country, and regardless of the rules of the House, shall do that which is right in his own eyes. That he is responsible only to the little section of this country which sends him to this Congress. I maintain that all parliamentary law and all judicial decisions are to the effect that the duty of each member of this House is to the country as a whole and not to his particular district, except as a part of the country, and not the disunion sentiment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] that Congress is simply an aggregation of ambassadors from three hundred and thirty-two separate political units.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, while this discussion was going on I had the pleasure of hearing a portion of the speech of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED], in which he made certain quotations from a previous debate in this House; and I want to say that in the same volume he read from is an opinion expressed by a man whose judgment upon matters of this kind we were accustomed to listen to, when he was here, with a great deal of respect. Mr. Speaker, he was from your own State of Georgia, and he left behind him a fame as great as that of any man probably who ever sat in this House. While the very discussion was going on referred to by the gentleman from Maine this distinguished citizen from Georgia gave expression to his opinion in a few interruptions which he made in the speech of my friend Mr. McLane of Maryland. Mr. Stephens asked the question:

Allow me to call the gentleman's attention to this fact, that the object of this amendment is to give a constructive vote to those who actually do not vote.

Mr. MCLANE. I do not so understand it.

Mr. STEPHENS. If not, what would it do? It requires a majority of a quorum on the record—that is, on the Journal—to constitute a vote of the House. If the object of this proposition is not to establish a system of constructive voting as to those who are absent or not voting, what do you gain?

He is referring to the proposition made by Mr. Tucker of Virginia, and he proceeds:

But when you take the yeas and nays upon the passage of a bill, it is never passed unless a majority of the House, a quorum, vote upon its passage. If there be not a majority of those thus voting, after leaving out the excused, the measure can not be carried. If this amendment means anything practical, it must be to provide for a constructive vote.

I have stated that this proposition was withdrawn by the mover himself, Mr. John Randolph Tucker, of Virginia.

Now, sir, a few days ago you adopted as a portion of the rules of this House a rule clothing the Speaker of this House with power to determine what is a dilatory motion, the very thing which my honorable friend from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] protested against last session. I suppose it is upon the same idea under which the populace proceed when the king is dead, in saying, "The king is dead," while with reference to the succeeding monarch they exclaim, "Long live the king." I was opposed to this power when it was exercised in this House, and I am opposed in principle to its exercise now. Two such motions were made by the present occupant of the chair and defeated in the last Congress, and my honorable friend from Illinois, when interrupted in the course of his speech and asked if he wanted it amended, said, "No, it is so bad that it can not be amended."

Now, are you going to put in these rules, besides this power which has been adopted, the additional power to clothe the Speaker, in any form, or in any shape of words, with the power to determine whether a man shall vote or not, the Constitution having provided in terms so explicit that all who run can read, and it can not be denied, that a majority of the members elected alone shall possess the power to do business here? It matters not whether the distinguished gentleman from Illinois was right or whether the distinguished gentleman from Maine was right in his speech. If you intend to put in any form of words clothing the Speaker or the assistants at the Clerk's desk with power to do that which a member has the right to do, you are virtually adopting the same rule which was adopted in the last Congress, giving the officers the power to do that which no man on earth can do save the Representative. He is responsible to his constituents. The gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] says, "You are giving the minority such very great power that I am tempted to go over from the majority to the minority in order to obtain some of the powers that you are giving them." Does the gentleman forget that if his illustrious example were followed by members of the majority, the minority would soon be swelled to a majority, and then the effect would be to put him in the same predicament when he has two-thirds majority that he would be in if he were in the minority?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I demand the previous question on the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Maine.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. CHIPMAN. Can we not have the amendment read again?

The amendment was again reported.

The question was taken; and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

RULE XVI.

ON MOTIONS, THEIR PRECEDENCE, ETC.

1. Every motion made to the House and entertained by the Speaker shall be reduced to writing on the demand of any member, and shall be entered on the Journal with the name of the member making it, unless it is withdrawn the same day.

2. When a motion has been made the Speaker shall state it, or (if it be in writing) cause it to be read aloud by the Clerk before being debated, and it shall then be in possession of the House, but may be withdrawn at any time before a decision or amendment.

3. When any motion or proposition is made, the question, Will the House now consider it? shall not be put unless demanded by a member.

4. When a question is under debate, no motion shall be received but to fix the day to which the House shall adjourn, to adjourn, to take a recess, to lay on the table, for the previous question (which motion shall be decided without debate), to postpone to a day certain, to refer or amend, or to postpone indefinitely, which several motions shall have precedence in the foregoing order; and no motion to postpone to a day certain, to refer, or to postpone indefinitely, being decided, shall be again allowed on the same day at the same stage of the question.

Mr. BYNUM. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment to section 4.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Amend section 4 of Rule XVI as follows:

Insert, in line 1, after the words "when a," the words "motion is pending, or a," and strike out, in the same line, the word "debate" and insert instead thereof the word "consideration." Also strike out, in line 2, the following words: "to fix the day to which the House shall adjourn." Also strike out, in line 3, the following words: "to take a recess;" so that it will read:

"SEC. 4. When a motion is pending, or a question under consideration, no motion shall be received but to adjourn, to lay on the table, for the previous question (which motions shall be decided without debate), to postpone to a day certain, to refer or amend, or to postpone indefinitely, which several motions shall have precedence in the foregoing order; and no motion to postpone to a day certain, to refer, or to postpone indefinitely, being decided, shall be again allowed on the same day at the same stage of the question."

Mr. BYNUM. Mr. Speaker, I do not think it is necessary that I should take up any great length of time in explaining the effect of this amendment. This rule is the one under which was carried on all the filibustering in preceding Congresses, which proved so unpopular. This rule, in connection with the clause following it, section 5 of the same rule, makes a motion to adjourn, a motion to fix a day to which the House shall adjourn, and a motion to take a recess privileged motions of the highest character. It was, I believe, under the régime of Speaker Blaine, when the force bill was under consideration, that a construction was given to these questions, so that a motion to fix a day to which the House shall adjourn, and a motion to take a recess, were held to be intervening business and could be alternated with a motion to adjourn. Under that construction filibustering became very simple. With the construction that has been given to it one member can filibuster without the yeas and nays being taken. He can move that the House adjourn, and while that motion is pending move to fix a day to which the House shall adjourn, and an amendment to that motion, and while these are pending move to take a recess. So that a vote upon one of these motions makes the others in order, and without the yeas and nays he will be able to worry the House until a majority retires and leaves the House without a quorum. The House would therefore, of course, be compelled to adjourn.

Now, I see no good reason for preserving these motions. It has been said that the Committee on Rules can report a resolution that will stop filibustering. Now I, like the gentleman from Maine, am perfectly willing to trust the Committee on Rules; but I am unwilling to trust myself. I have generally been found among the filibusterers, and, as has been well said by the gentleman from Maine, filibustering has not always been on political questions. It has been more upon other questions. It might be that the Representatives from Chicago, as in the last Congress, might undertake to prevent the passage of the pure-lard bill, and it might be that in retaliation some gentleman upon the other side of the question might undertake to prevent the passage of a World's Fair bill. It is upon these questions, and not upon political questions, that filibustering has been carried to an unwarranted extent in this House.

It was upon the pure-lard bill that there was filibustering in the last Congress; it was against the oleomargarine bill in the Forty-ninth Congress that obstructive tactics were resorted to, and it is generally on questions which are unpopular in one section and popular in another that filibustering takes place. In the Forty-eighth Congress the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds had a continuing order that would have enabled them to take up the whole session in the consideration of bills upon the Calendar, yet it is a fact that that committee was unable to pass one single measure because of the filibustering practiced by members who were opposed to the appropriations for public buildings, and after three or four days the attempt was abandoned.

Mr. EZRA B TAYLOR. Does not the gentleman think it probable that the "rights of the minority" might be infringed by this proposition which he offers?

Mr. BYNUM. Well, Mr. Speaker, I do not know that the gentleman asks that question in the utmost good faith. However, I will not raise any question about that. But I say, as was said by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] the other day, that if any respectable number of members in this House determine to block legislation they will block it in spite of all the rules that you can adopt.

Mr. REED. Not in spite of rules that you might adopt.

Mr. BYNUM. It is a fact, Mr. Speaker, that if a minority of members determine that there shall be no legislation upon any question they have absolute power to prevent it under the rules as they will exist even after this amendment is adopted. Now, it is said that we ought to preserve these rules as they are, and then if filibustering is practiced to an unwarranted extent, the Committee on Rules will report a rule which will enable us to proceed. But the case is simply this: No one ever saw a majority in this House filibuster upon any question. Filibustering is always by a minority; and if it is wrong to filibuster for a great length of time, it is wrong to clothe the minority with the power to filibuster for any length of time. Therefore, whenever, in the course of business, a majority in the House determine that a measure ought to be considered and adopted, I do not believe that they ought to be compelled to stop and go to the Committee on Rules and ask to be allowed to proceed with the measure. I believe they ought to be allowed to proceed then and there, and the amendment that I have proposed will have no other effect. It will be possible after the adoption of this amendment to delay for a certain length of time, but not for an unreasonable period, the passage of a measure. In the end the majority of the House will be able to proceed without being compelled to go to any committee and ask for power of doing so. The amendment, in the interest of legitimate legislation, ought to be adopted.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, the objection that I have to the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BYNUM], as I understand it, is this: I think every gentleman who has been here any length of time knows that it not infrequently happens that very important bills, bills that ought to receive the attention of this House, are rushed through without due consideration. I have seen measures, which I thought bad measures, on which the previous question was ordered, and the passage of which could not possibly have been stopped except by resorting to dilatory motions—in some cases bills that probably would disgrace the House. Why is it that such things occur here? It is because we all know that members frequently become weary and leave their seats and go into the cloakrooms or into their committee rooms, so that there may not be fifty members of the House present when an attempt is made to put such a bill through in that way.

Mr. BYNUM. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. BLAND. Yes, sir.

Mr. BYNUM. I wish to ask the gentleman whether there is not more danger of that happening by allowing filibustering to be carried on to such an extent as to compel the bringing in of a new rule fixing the time at which a vote shall be taken, instead of having the question considered under the rules as regularly framed?

Mr. BLAND. In answer to the gentleman's question I will say that I have seen the previous question ordered here upon bills that ought not to pass, but which would have passed then and there if some gentleman apprehending, perhaps without knowledge of the contents of the bill, but merely from the title, that it was an improper measure, had not moved an adjournment or made some other dilatory motion in order to gain time to bring members back to their seats.

The right to make these motions is a means of defeating measures of that kind which ought to be defeated. Furthermore, it often happens that the majority want to have a bill passed without due consideration, that they are not willing to give the minority an opportunity to discuss it, and I say that it is legitimate filibustering for the minority to move an adjournment, or to make any other dilatory motion, to compel justice to be done to them. So far as these filibustering motions are concerned, when they are exercised in that way they are just and proper, and the exercise of them conduces to the public benefit; and I am opposed to going any further than we have already gone in curtailing the rights of members in that direction. We are secure against any unreasonable delay. Why, then, go any further?

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, the method of doing business under a free government is just as vital a part of freedom as anything else, and I think, sir, that the theory of free government is that the great thing to be protected is the rights of minorities. I confess that I have not been able to understand—certainly I have not been able at all to approve or sympathize with—the views expressed in this debate as to the absolute rights of majorities in a body like this. Why, our written Constitution, most of the laws upon our statute books, and the rules of procedure in this House likewise, have at bottom the idea of protecting the equal rights of the minority; and, while the rule of a majority is the working rule of free government, Mr. Jefferson well said that it is no part of the theory of free institutions that you should obliterate minorities.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am not one of those who believe that it is either politic or necessary to smooth the way in this House for lawmaking beyond what has been done in the past. I do not believe that this country ever has suffered from the want of legislation. I believe, with Mr. Hamilton, that the danger, the natural disease, of popular government is the facility and the excess of legislation. And I believe, with Mr. Jefferson, that there is a constant watchfulness needed against such facility and such excess. Mr. Jefferson himself said that a law should be proposed one year in advance of its decision; that it should be fully debated and deliberately examined before it was placed upon the statute book; and I do not believe that we could let loose on this House or on the country a greater scourge or a more dangerous one than "the art of legislation made easy."

Now, Mr. Speaker, gentlemen have debated this question as if we accomplished nothing in the Forty-eighth and the Forty-ninth and the Fiftieth Congresses—as if, to use the language of one gentleman on the other side, wherever we attempted to go we found the sign "No thoroughfare." Let gentlemen look back to the history of those Congresses; and let them tell us what popular measures, what measures for the benefit of the American people, what measures demanded by an intelligent public sentiment in this country were defeated in those Congresses by any defect in the rules or by any power conferred upon the minority to stay legislation. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Speaker, I take it that the question of the character of the rules to be adopted in this House ought to be, as far as possible, nonpartisan. As I understand it, the decision of the great questions that divide the parties constitutes the stakes which must be played for in the presence of the American people; and the rules governing this House are little more than the methods in which the game of politics must be played. I confess that I am somewhat surprised to find a gentleman who bears the high character of the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON] discussing here as an original proposition the right of a minority under a constitutional government to the enjoyment of its property and its liberty, and making that right the standard of the right of a minority in a legislative body. I can not understand the confusion of thought which would place the right of a single member of the populace, whether he be in the majority or in the minority on political questions, upon the same level with the right of a minority or a member of the minority in a legislative body.

I agree with the gentleman that hasty legislation is to be deplored, and that it has been the fruitful parent of evil. I agree with the principles enunciated by Mr. Jefferson that it might be well if every law were proposed a year in advance of the time when it is to be considered. Nay, more; I believe that that tribe mentioned, I believe, by Gibbon, had the best political institution ever known in that one which provided that any person proposing a change in their ancient laws should be brought into the council with a rope round his neck, the rope to be pulled if the proposed law were rejected, and he to be crowned as chief among the tribe if the law should be adopted. I believe that of the mass of legislation precipitated upon this country in Congress and in all the States the vast majority is vicious, and might well be defeated.

But if we are to establish the principle that a minority can block legislation, it may be a valuable one, but it not in accordance with a system of parliamentary government. It may be that there is a better form of government than the parliamentary one; that is a proposition which I can assume the House will not now discuss. For if a majority can not control the legislative body then there is absolute paralysis of the legislative machinery, and the gentleman from West Virginia must know that this attempt to buttress the rights of the minority into such a degree of absolute impregnability that the proceedings of the House can be blocked by them is tantamount to placing the House at the mercy of the minority, and is therefore a complete subversion of parliamentary government.

Now, Mr. Speaker, pardon me a moment further that I may state what I consider ought to be the main object before us in adopting all these rules. We have just established the right of the majority to count its quorum in any way it may think proper. We have equipped the House with the power, through the Committee on Rules, to stop filibustering whenever the House wants to stop it and permit it whenever the House wants to permit it. This rule now under discussion has been reported by the Committee on Rules, and as it now stands I shall support it. I shall support it because the House is already protected from the practice of filibustering so far as protection has seemed necessary to it. I should not support it if I thought it tended to interfere at all with the power of the House, or to establish any other rule for the regulation of its proceedings than the will of the majority.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I am very reluctant to occupy any of the time of the House, for I think it exceedingly important that these rules be adopted promptly so that the House may proceed at once to business. But, Mr. Speaker, I can not allow this debate to close without saying a word in regard to the proposition of my friend and colleague [Mr. BYNUM]. I regret to differ from him in opinion upon this or any other subject; but I should be exceedingly sorry to see the amendment proposed by him adopted. Notwithstanding the brilliant utterances of the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN], and notwithstanding all that has been said in derogation of the rights of minorities, I do not wish to see the minority unduly trammeled. The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON], whose views I cordially indorse, speaks truly when he says that the rules are more important to give vigor and vigilance to a minority than for any other purpose.

I have never known a valuable measure to be defeated by the exercise of this right, but I can recall to mind a long list of pernicious measures which have been defeated by the minority. The loss of a few days in this House, the matter of the inconvenience to ourselves, perhaps, is nothing, Mr. Speaker, in comparison with the importance of preventing the passage through Congress of pernicious measures.

The gentleman from West Virginia says that one of the perils, the actual perils to free institutions in this country, is the very great mass of legislation in all legislative bodies that is accumulating year after year. This is the condition in almost every State throughout the Union, and every State almost, perhaps every State, has sought to impose restrictions upon legislation, because the same condition that prevails in the Congress of the United States has prevailed and is prevailing in all legislative bodies throughout this country. Perhaps it prevails to a greater extent here than elsewhere, and a restriction has been imposed in many of the States, requiring that certain measures of legislation shall lie over after their introduction for a limited time before consideration. This restriction has been of marked benefit.

I trust, therefore, that the motion of my colleague will not be adopted. Why should it be adopted after adopting, as we have done, this provision in the fifty-first clause of the rule, which confers certain powers upon the Committee on Rules? After adopting that provision, I think it would be exceedingly unfortunate to restrict gentlemen who may propose to secure only fair debate or their right to amend by proposing to postpone for the time being action upon the pending measure.

Mr. COMPTON. Mr. Speaker, I dislike exceedingly to detain the House with any further discussion of this matter, because I know gentlemen are weary and anxious to conclude the business now in hand. I want to say in the outset of my remarks that I subscribe with my best judgment and whole heart to the declarations so clearly and forcibly set forth by the distinguished gentleman from Texas on the general propositions in all of these amendments to the rules, particularly to the amendment presented by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED].

Now, Mr. Speaker, progress is a tempting word, a tempting consideration, but particularly so with young Americans. But, Mr. Speaker, progress, to be valuable, must be in the right direction; and progress, when in the wrong direction, is subversive and destructive of everything an American should hold dear. The gentleman from Maine, panoplied in the impenetrable robe of his own colossal self-esteem, has sought to transfer his mysterious declarations, metaphors, metaphysics, and sophistries from the North American Review to the forum of this House. He seeks to capture the judgment of men here by covering his proposition with a general veneering, which he calls "progress!" Progress! Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to say right here that, as the record of that gentleman discloses, he seeks on this floor to play the baby act in defense of the only record and declaration that ever fell from his lips, so far as the records of the American Congress show, in which he advocated, like a man, the rights of the American Representative and the liberties of the people whom he represents.

But, sir, the gentleman talks of "progress." Think for a moment of the philosophical wisdom concentrated in that standard of parliamentary law, Jefferson's Manual, coming as it did from the brain and the experience of the greatest tribune of all of the great tribunes of the people. Think of the interpretation, the enforcement of its cardinal doctrines, as illustrated and enforced by the illustrious predecessors of the gentleman from Maine, who have occupied that chair. Think of the interpretation of the parliamentary principles and rules, founded thereon, by a Clay, by a Winthrop, by a Polk, by a Banks, by a Blaine, by a Carlisle, and by a Randall, and then contrast the propositions submitted by the gentleman from Maine with that historic record, and tell me if that is "progress." If that be progress, Mr. Speaker, may the American Congress and the American people be forever delivered from such progress, if it tends in the direction that the gentleman from Maine is going.

Progress! I have no doubt, sir, that when the tyrant Cæsar crossed the Rubicon and the liberties of Rome were destroyed, he would have inscribed upon his banners as he marched to the destruction of the liberties of the Republic that same word, "Progress." I have no doubt that when Napoleon Bonaparte assumed the purple, and put the diadem upon the heads of his followers, he would have claimed that that also was in the line of progress. I know that the illustrious predecessors of the gentleman from Maine who controlled the course of the party which he represents, and of which he is a distinguished member, when they blotted out the last vestige of the rights of the people and took possession with bayonets of the ballot boxes in the South, encircling them with a cordon of bayonets, when they inaugurated governors in opposition to the expressed will of the people and assaulted legislative authority by the force of Federal arms, while the Old World looked on in amazement, they thought or claimed that they also were in the line of progress. And I believe that when, blinded in his conscience and judgment by partisanship, he occupied that chair, and by virtue of the code of rules under which he was acting, forced through this body a bill certainly in violation of the best provisions of the Constitution, wiping out the last vestige of State lines and turning over the whole of the election machinery of this country into the hands of Federal supervisors, partisans per se, he thought he was in the line of progress. But, Mr. Speaker, for one, as a Democrat, I want no such progress. I stand by the doctrines affecting personal rights and liberty as interpreted by the fathers, and God grant that no spirit of progress shall ever wipe out the essence of American liberty as embodied in those provisions. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CATCHINGS. Mr. Speaker, without regard to the merits or the demerits of the proposed amendment, I desire to say that I hope the House will not adopt it, because in Rule IX, which has already been adopted, we have recognized these identical motions as motions of the highest privilege. Rule IX is as follows:

> Questions of privilege shall be, first, those affecting the rights of the House collectively, its safety, dignity, and the integrity of its proceedings; second, the rights, reputation, and conduct of members individually in their representative capacity only; and shall have precedence of all other questions, except motions to fix the day to which the House shall adjourn, to adjourn, and for a recess.

So the House has already passed upon this question and has adopted these motions which the amendment seeks to strike out, as motions of the highest privilege, and to adopt the amendment suggested by my friend from Indiana would simply beget an apparent repugnance between two different rules and might invite confusion in their construction. I hope my friend will withdraw the amendment and let us go on with the rules.

Mr. BYNUM. Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to trespass on the time of the House at any great length, and yet I feel that I ought to say a few words in addition to what I have already said.

Mr. Speaker, I yield to no one a greater respect for the rights of a minority than I have; and while I say that I am not so hidebound as to believe that a minority are always possessed of all the intelligence, virtue, and patriotism, I believe that the rights of a majority are entitled to equal respect and to equal dignity. The gentleman from West Virginia says that no one can mention a bill defeated by filibustering which was for the benefit of the general welfare.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman is very ingenious in taking such a position. He knows full well that no one can show the benefits of a bill that has not become a law.

In all history nothing of the kind can be cited. It is only the success of a measure which demonstrates its practicability and its beneficial results; and unless it is enacted in the law it is easy to say that it would have been injurious, and proof to the contrary is impossible. Now, I want to call attention to the fact that the Committee on Rules, when it brings in a special rule for the consideration of a measure, must necessarily couple with that resolution a provision that at a certain time a vote shall be taken. In other words, the resolution of a committee fixing the consideration of a measure must necessarily incorporate in it a provision which to a certain degree will restrict this House under the regular rules, or these filibustering motions will still be in order. After you fix a day for the consideration of a measure, as well as before, these dilatory motions will be in order.

In brief, if the Committee on Rules give a day for the consideration of a measure, you have not stopped filibustering by so doing. You have not enabled the House to proceed without interruption. The committee must go further, and say that at a certain time the previous question shall be ordered and a vote taken, before you have stopped filibustering. If you allow consideration under the rules as they have been reported, without cutting off debate, without cutting off the power of amendment, then these filibustering motions will be used, and we may and no doubt will be forced to abandon our rules and do business as was done in the last Congress, almost wholly under special order. Mr. Speaker, the unjust demands of a minority has led the majority of this House to restrict the power of amendment, to restrict the power of debate, more than anything else. The rules amply guard and preserve the rights of a minority without conferring upon that minority the right to absolutely check and prohibit all legislation.

When a few members of a minority undertake to block legislation, bad blood is always developed, and the majority looses patience; and when it comes to fixing a rule for the consideration of the bill, will more likely fix an unreasonable rule, cutting off amendments and cutting off debate, than if left to proceed under the general rules of the House. The rules, as I have said, amply protect the minority. After the introduction of a bill, it goes to a committee composed of a majority and a minority representation. It receives due consideration in that committee. A report is prepared upon it, published, and sent to every member. It is considered here. There is a motion to adjourn, and a roll call upon that. There is a motion to lay upon the table. There is a motion to postpone indefinitely; a motion to recommit it. The opposition to any measure can block legislation upon it for a reasonable length of time, in order that the attention of every member of the House and the country may be called to it. The rule that I have proposed simply seeks to protect the majority of this House from unreasonable delay and factious opposition.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Indiana.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the "noes" seemed to have it.

Mr. BYNUM. I ask for the yeas and nays, in order to obviate loss of time.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. Before the roll call is commenced, Mr. Speaker, there are a number of gentlemen in the neighborhood of my seat who say they do not understand the amendment, and I ask that it be read again.

The amendment was again reported.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 87, nays 164, not voting 80, as follows:

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. REILLY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask leave of absence for my colleague [Mr. MCALEER] for to-day and to-morrow. He is paired with his colleague [Mr. SHONK].

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, my colleague [Mr. HEARD] was absent yesterday from the House on account of sickness, and is absent to-day for the same reason. I desire leave for him.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. RICHARDSON). Without objection these leaves will be granted.

The following pairs were announced:

Until further notice:

Mr. WEADOCK with Mr. RUSSELL.

Mr. MCALEER with Mr. SHONK.

Mr. COBB of Alabama with Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois.

Mr. BUNN with Mr. ATKINSON.

Mr. HEMPHILL with Mr. GROUT, until further notice, except on the rules.

For this day:

Mr. CROSBY with Mr. CURTIS.

Mr. HEARD with Mr. REYBURN.

Mr. TUCKER with Mr. PICKLER.

Mr. SCOTT with Mr. SANFORD.

Mr. MCKINNEY with Mr. CALDWELL, for the rest of this day.

Mr. RUSK with Mr. MILLIKEN, on this vote.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Mr. Speaker, the word "motion," in the fourth line of clause 4, should be in the plural, "motions;" and I ask that that correction be made.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent for a verbal amendment to be made to this clause. If there be no objection the amendment will be made.

There was no objection, and the amendment was made.

The Clerk read as follows:

5. A motion to fix the day to which the House shall adjourn, a motion to adjourn, and to take a recess shall always be in order, and the hour at which the House adjourns shall be entered on the Journal.

Mr. BURROWS. I move to strike from that clause the words:

A motion to fix the day to which the House shall adjourn, * * * to take a recess.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman desire to be heard?

Mr. BURROWS. I do not.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. REED. I move to strike out the whole clause.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

9. At any time after the expiration of the morning hour it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering bills raising revenue or general appropriation bills.

Mr. BURROWS. I offer as an additional clause to Rule XVI, to be known as clause 10, the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

No dilatory motion shall be entertained by the Speaker.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Speaker, by the code of rules so far considered and passed upon by this House it is provided that when the Committee on Rules makes a report no dilatory motion shall be entertained by the Speaker when that report is under consideration. I fail to see why that privilege should be accorded to the Committee on Rules and denied to every other committee of this House. I fail to see why that privilege should be accorded to that committee and denied to the individual membership of this House. By the proposition just offered it is proposed that the Speaker shall not entertain any dilatory motion. Then whenever any proposition is before the House and being considered, whether it is advocated or advanced by a committee or by an individual member of this House, no dilatory motion can be applied to it, but the House shall be brought to a direct vote upon the proposition, without a dilatory motion, and the sense of the House taken upon its merits.

The rules as formulated up to this time expose every single committee of this House and every individual member of it to filibustering motions, and compel the committee or the individual, if he ever succeeded in getting a vote upon a proposition, to appeal to the Committee on Rules to stop these dilatory motions.

For instance, suppose the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures shall report a measure for the free coinage of silver under these rules, and a minority, composed of gentlemen on this side or on the other side, or on both sides, commence filibustering against the consideration of that measure, under this system of rules you will be compelled to appeal to the Committee on Rules for an order to stop that filibustering. Now, if the Committee on Rules shall take it into its head to suppress the request of another committee of this House, or of an individual, for such a special order, that is the end of it, and a vote can never be reached on that proposition. Let no man delude himself with the idea that the Committee on Rules can be compelled to report in such a case, because under these rules it can not be compelled to report; so that it will be utterly impossible to bring the House to a vote upon the proposition.

Now, the amendment I propose is this: That instead of appealing to the Committee on Rules to report an order for the consideration of that measure, and to stop filibustering, the Speaker shall be prohibited from recognizing dilatory motions upon that or upon any other measure, and that, when filibustering is instituted, he shall at once decline to entertain dilatory motions, and thereby bring the House to a vote upon the main proposition. In other words, I want this House to understand just what it is doing by adopting these rules. It is putting the control of the House and all its legislation absolutely in the hands of three gentlemen, the Speaker of the House and the two members of the majority of the Committee on Rules; and whenever you have a proposition in this House, whether it be a great public measure or a measure in which the people of your district are interested, as, for instance, a bill for the construction of a public building, if any number of gentlemen, one or two or more, shall see fit to filibuster against that proposition, you never can get a vote without appealing to the Committee on Rules.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CATCHINGS. Let us have a vote, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. BURROWS. I would like two or three minutes more.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be allowed five minutes more.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. BURROWS. I say that under the rules there will be no way of getting a vote upon a proposition for the consideration of your public-building bill or any other unless the Committee on Rules approve of the measure. You have to ask that committee to report a special order fixing a time when the vote upon your bill shall be taken, and if they see fit not to report that special order you can never get a vote upon your bill under these rules. But if, on the other hand, the proposition is one which the Committee on Rules or the managers of the Democratic party here think ought to be put forward, then a special order will be reported for that purpose.

Now, gentlemen, if you adopt this system of rules you might as well go home at once, the great body of this House, because you will have abrogated your power as the Representatives of your districts; you will have surrendered the sovereignty of the people who sent you here; you will have said by your votes: "We are not competent to legislate, so we propose to turn the whole question of legislation over to three gentlemen who have been chosen as leaders of the majority, and the fate of all propositions in which our districts are interested is consigned entirely to the judgment of those gentlemen."

Now, I say that when any committee of this House reports a proposition to the House and that proposition is placed on the Calendar and is reached for consideration, and filibustering is attempted against it, there is no earthly reason why the Speaker should not, in the interest of legislation, be clothed with the power to refuse to recognize any motion that is dilatory, and there is no reason why he should not have that power without being compelled to appeal to the Committee on Rules to clothe him with it in that particular case. I believe that is in the interest of the business of this House, and it is certainly in the interest of every individual of the House who comes here pledged to the passage of certain measures in which his constituency are particularly concerned.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Let us have a vote, Mr. Speaker.

The question was taken on the amendment of Mr. BURROWS, and the Speaker pro tempore declared that the "noes" seemed to have it.

Mr. BURROWS. I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 34, noes 96.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. ENLOE. I offer an amendment to this section.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman desire to offer it as an independent paragraph?

Mr. ENLOE. I desire to offer an amendment to the last paragraph, the amendment which I send to the desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Add to clause 9: "or other bills of a public nature."

Mr. ENLOE. Mr. Speaker, I want to state to the House my reason for offering that amendment. My object is to place public measures which may be of such importance that the House may desire to consider them in such a position that they can be got up for consideration in some other way than by undertaking to reach them on the Calendar as "unfinished business." As I understand this code of rules it will leave every public measure subject to the action of anybody who may choose to filibuster out the morning hour, so that it will be impossible to get at important public measures except by reaching them upon the Calendar as unfinished business; and those of us who have had experience here know that when you get a bill on the Calender as "unfinished business" it is practically a finished business, because it is never reached again. [Laughter.] Now, I want to have these rules in such form that the House, if it desires to consider a public measure of importance to the whole country, can, when the motion is made to that effect, determine whether it will consider that measure in preference to an appropriation bill or a bill raising revenue. That is the object of my amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the next rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

RULE XVII.

1. There shall be a motion for the previous question, which, being ordered by a majority of members present, if a quorum, shall have the effect to cut off all debate and bring the House to a direct vote upon the immediate question or questions on which it has been asked and ordered. The previous question may be asked and ordered upon a single motion, a series of motions allowable under the rules, or an amendment or amendments, or may be made to embrace all authorized motions or amendments and include the bill to its engrossment and third reading, and then, on renewal and second of said motion, to its passage or rejection. It shall be in order, pending the motion for or after the previous question shall have been ordered on its passage, for the Speaker to entertain and submit a motion to commit, with or without instructions, to a standing or select committee; and a motion to lay upon the table shall be in order on the second and third reading of a bill.

2. A call of the House shall not be in order after the previous question is ordered, unless it shall appear upon an actual count by the Speaker that a quorum is not present.

3. All incidental questions of order arising after a motion is made for the previous question and pending such motion, shall be decided, whether on appeal or otherwise, without debate.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Speaker, there is in this rule another opportunity for delay, and I can see no other purpose for engrafting it in the rule. If the House will look at the rule it will find that it is provided, commencing with the fifth line, that the previous question may be asked and ordered upon a single motion, a series of motions allowable under the rules, or an amendment or amendments, or may be made to embrace all authorized motions or amendments, and include the bill to its engrossment and third reading; and then, on renewal and second of such motion, to its passage to rejection.

Mr. Speaker, I move to amend the pending paragraph by striking out the words, "its engrossment and third reading, and then, on renewal and second of said motion, to."

Under this rule as it is now framed a gentleman in charge of a bill moves the previous question on the engrossment and third reading of the bill; and if that is carried, then, after the engrossment and third reading, he must again demand the previous question on the passage of the bill. Now, after a bill has passed to its engrossment and third reading it is beyond the stage of amendment; and there appears no necessity for providing in the rule for these two motions for the previous question. In the last Congress the words I propose to strike out were eliminated, so that the gentleman in charge of a bill could move the previous question on the engrossment and third reading and passage of the bill.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Allow me to suggest to the gentleman from Michigan (who is a better parliamentarian than I am) whether after the third reading of a bill there might not be an amendment put on it in the nature of a "rider," which could not be done if the previous question were operating upon the passage of the bill. Is not that the reason of the rule being reported in its present form? I merely ask for information.

Mr. BURROWS. I will state to the gentleman from Kentucky that after the engrossment and third reading of a bill it has passed beyond the stage of amendment.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. It can not be amended in the ordinary form; but can not a "rider" be put upon it?

Mr. BURROWS. I think not; that would simply be a form of amendment.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. May it not be recommitted with instructions to incorporate a particular amendment?

Mr. BURROWS. That could be done after the previous question had been ordered on the third reading and passage of the bill even if my amendment were adopted. But the rule as proposed here requires two motions for the previous question—first on the engrossment and third reading, and secondly on the passage, which would necessitate two roll calls if they were insisted upon, and would open the door for filibustering upon each motion.

Now, in the Fifty-first Congress we eliminated the clause which I now propose to strike out, and allowed the motion for the previous question to cover the engrossment, third reading, and passage of the bill. If my amendment be adopted the clause will provide that the previous question may "include the bill to its passage or rejection," thus necessitating but one motion for the previous question.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. BURROWS, it was rejected, there being—ayes 38, noes 92.

The Clerk read as follows:

Any amendment of the Senate to any House bill shall be subject to the point of order that it shall first be considered in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, if originating in the House it would be subject to that point.

Mr. MCRAE. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend by inserting between the word "bill" and the word "shall," in the first line of the rule just read, these words: "may be considered and disposed of at the time the bill is laid before the House by the Speaker, but."

Mr. Speaker, I hope the amendment will be adopted. Its purpose is simply to allow immediate consideration of House bills with Senate amendments when they are laid before the House by the Speaker, subject to the point of order that they shall be considered in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, if originating in the House it would be subject to that point. I can see no good reason why there should be any opposition to this amendment, and I hope the Committee on Rules will accept it.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I am afraid my friend from Arkansas [Mr. MCRAE] makes a mistake in offering this amendment. Under the amendment a bill coming from the Senate and containing it may be an important appropriation of money would be entitled to immediate consideration without a moment's examination by any committee. Other cases illustrative of the objection to the gentleman's proposition might be stated. Suppose a bill, unimportant in itself, passes this House and goes to the Senate, where it is changed in a vital manner. Such a bill on coming back to this House would be entitled to immediate consideration without any reference to a committee. I trust the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. MCRAE. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] does not understand, or at any rate he fails to state, its effect. With this amendment the rule will still allow all bills carrying appropriations to be referred the Committee of the Whole House whenever the point is made that it should be so referred and considered. It does not require that the bill as amended shall be immediately passed upon; but it gives the House the right to consider its own bills when they are laid before the House with the amendment of the Senate. It may be referred to the Committee of the Whole House or to a standing committee if desired by the House. Under the rule, without this amendment, all bills must, unless unanimous consent is given, be referred, however meritorious and harmless the bill.

Unless something of this kind be agreed to, we put ourselves in the attitude of discriminating against House bills. To illustrate, a bill is passed by the House, goes to the Senate; when received an immaterial amendment is made. The bill comes back to the House, and can be disposed of in a moment, but under the rule it must, whether a majority of the House so desires or not, be referred to a standing committee, and when reported is put at the heel of the Calendar. That means the defeat of the measure, for the Calendar is never reached in this House. If my amendment be agreed to, a great many matters of minor importance, that the House would be ready and willing to dispose of at once, could and would be acted on immediately without the constant appeal for unanimous consent. But if the old rule be adopted, we shall find that but few of the House bills will become laws. The alternative will be either to take up Senate bills and rush them through by unanimous consent without consideration or to do nothing with these small matters.

Mr. BLAND. As I understand the gentleman's amendment, it will not prohibit an appropriation bill or any other bill properly belonging to the Committee of the Whole from being considered by that committee.

Mr. McRAE. No, sir; that right is preserved by the amendment. If the point be made, all bills properly referable must go to the Committee of the Whole—must be so referred. The only effect of the amendment is that when a House bill is returned from the Senate with amendments, it shall be in order when the amendment is laid before the House by the Speaker to give the House the right to take up and consider the measure instead of having it go on one objection to a committee to die. It is so reasonable that no one ought to object to it.

Mr. BLAND. I do not see any objection to that.

Mr. HOLMAN. It certainly will not be subject to a point of order. I hope the proposition as suggested will be reported as it will stand if the amendment is adopted.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. McRAE. If that is not clear I can not see how it could be made clearer.

Mr. HOLMAN. I did not notice the force of the last provision.

Mr. DOCKERY. It seems to be a good amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 90, noes 98.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

1. Every bill and joint resolution shall receive three readings before its passage, which shall be as follows: The first and second readings by title on introduction for reference, or, being original bills, on report from committees for commitment, except when the second reading in full shall be demanded by a member: Provided, That original bills, on being reported by unanimous consent for present consideration, shall be read the first time in full; the second and third time by title, unless the third reading in full shall be demanded by a member.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I ask unanimous consent that that paragraph be passed over for the present. I make the request because I know an amendment will be offered to the next rule, which, if adopted, will make it necessary to rearrange this paragraph.

There being no objection, the request was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

3. No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress. Nor shall any provision in any such bill or amendment thereto changing existing law be in order, except such as, being germane to the subject-matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures by the reduction of the number and salary of the officers of the United States, by the reduction of the compensation of any person paid out of the Treasury of the United States, or by the reduction of amounts of money covered by the bill: Provided, That it shall be in order further to amend such bill upon the report of the committee having jurisdiction of the subject-matter of such amendment, which amendment, being germane to the subject-matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures.

Mr. BOATNER. I desire to offer an amendment to this section, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend paragraph 3, Rule XXI, by striking out all the paragraph after the word "order," in line 6; so that it will read:

"No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress. Nor shall any provision in any such bill or amendment thereto changing existing law be in order."

Mr. BOATNER. This amendment is offered in order to deprive the Committee on Appropriations of the power to incorporate legislation on the appropriation bills. In other words, it conforms the rule of this Congress to the rule, as I understand it, which prevailed in the Fiftieth Congress.

There is nothing I can say on the subject which will give any additional light to the House. The members here are doubtless well acquainted with the effect of the rule as it existed heretofore.

I offer the amendment to take the sense of the House whether they are willing to embark on this class of legislation and permit the Committee on Appropriations, instead of confining them to their legitimate duty of making appropriations to carry on the Government according to existing law, to incorporate on their appropriation bills such new measures of legislation as may meet their approval.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, when this subject was up for consideration in the general debate I did not participate, feeling that I could say all that would probably be necessary on the subject of this rule in the five-minute debate. I regret now that I had not addressed myself to the question, for I am very confident that if this measure is well understood the House will not sustain the motion to strike out. I wish to refer briefly to the history of this rule—that part of it proposed to be stricken out. The rule was introduced into the House by a member of the Democratic party acting in concert with Democratic colleagues in the Forty-second Congress, but failed of adoption. It was introduced again by a member of that party in the Forty-third Congress, referred to the Committee of War Claims, simply for the purpose, if possible, to get the measure before the House, as that committee was in favor of it, and there was no distinctive Committee on Rules. No action was taken upon it in that Congress, however.

When the Democratic party came into power in the Forty-fourth Congress and looked over the ground, it was clear there could be no retrenchment of the expenses of this Government unless the rules were changed so as to create some facilities for reduction, and accordingly the rule was adopted in the following form, providing that no appropriation bill or amendment should be in order changing existing law, except such provisions and amendments which, being germane to the subject-matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures.

That was the rule adopted by the Forty-fourth Congress, and it was adopted the moment that the party had the power in the course of business to do so. The effect of that was this very striking result. Mr. Randall of Pennsylvania was the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. The appropriations made by the Forty-third Congress in its two sessions were $362,851,212.06. The appropriations made by the Forty-fourth Congress, $299,144,788.88, a reduction of $63,705,423.18.

Mr. BLAND. In the two sessions.

Mr. HOLMAN. In the two sessions of the Forty-fourth Congress; being the largest reduction ever made by one Congress, compared with its predecessor, in our history; a large portion of which was made in the first session of the Forty-fourth Congress. And upon that the Democratic party went before the country in 1876, and gentlemen know the result. Tilden and Hendricks were elected President and Vice-President, but, as gentlemen know, were never inaugurated.

Mr. SAYERS. I would like to ask my friend from Indiana whether or not he attributes that large reduction to the existence of this rule or to the fact that there was a change in the control of this House?

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not understand the gentleman.

Mr. SAYERS. That Democrats had got control of the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. Why, certainly, or no reduction would have been made in expenditures. But how could the Democrats have reduced the expenditures of the Government unless they had the power to do just what the rule authorized? How could they have made any reduction at all? How can you make reductions in the expenses of carrying on this Government except in a large degree by reducing salaries and abolishing offices and the like, and repealing and modifying laws? Here was the beginning. There was a retrenchment, as will be seen, of more than $63,000,000 in the two sessions of the Forty-fourth Congress, a larger sum than was necessary to carry on your Government only thirty-one years ago.

Mr. BLOUNT. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman has stated the actual reduction. I wish him to state if that was not the result of a compromise between the two Houses, and if the reduction actually proposed by the House was not very much larger.

Mr. HOLMAN. Oh, enormously. I have only stated what we accomplished under this rule.

The time of Mr. HOLMAN having expired, on motion of Mr. WISE and Mr. DINGLEY, it was extended for five minutes.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to state that in the Forty-fifth Congress that rule was changed and somewhat restricted. The original rule allowed any legislation on an appropriation bill, if germane, which would reduce expenditures; but in the Forty-fifth Congress the rule was put in its present form substantially. Now, how far can you legislate on an appropriation bill under this proposed rule? It does not go as far as I wish. It allows you to retrench by provisions on an appropriation bill for three purposes only, and it is those three purposes the gentleman from Louisiana proposes to strike out. The three purposes are, first, by the reduction of the number and salaries of the officers of the United States. I wish the ear of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BOATNER] a moment. The first provision for retrenchment under this rule is by a reduction of the number of officers and reduction of the salaries of officers of the United States.

Now, does my friend propose that we shall not reduce the number of officers nor reduce in any case the salaries of officers of the United States? Why, I shall show that after that rule was abolished the number of offices began to steadily increase, and finally increased beyond any precedent in your history except in time of war. Does the gentleman propose to deprive this House of the opportunity to reduce the number of officers and to reduce their salaries? I will yield for a reply if my friend will give it now, or I hope he will reply later. I assure this side of the House that if you propose to disarm yourselves of the power of reducing salaries and reducing the number of officers employed by this Government this amendment will accomplish that purpose. The second way in which you can retrench under the rule now pending——

Mr. BURROWS. Will my friend allow a question right there?

Mr. HOLMAN. I have so little time I can not yield.

Mr. BURROWS. I would like to ask a question.

Mr. HOLMAN. Gentlemen say, as to the abolishing of unnecessary offices and the reducing of salaries, "Why, bring in your bills." Did any gentleman ever know of a separate bill going through Congress reducing the number of offices or reducing salaries?

Mr. BLOUNT. The Senate would not notice such a bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. Of course not. I do not think you will find an instance of that in the history of Congress; certainly not in the last thirty years. Such a bill would go to a committee of the Senate and of course there would be the end of it. But the second way in which you may legislate under the pending rule is by the reduction of the compensation of any person paid out of the Treasury of the United States. Do you wish to deprive yourselves of that power?

In the third place, by the reduction of amounts of money covered by the bill. Do you wish to deprive yourselves of that power, gentlemen? If you do, sustain this motion to strike out. My friend from Louisiana simply proposes now to strike out the provisions authorizing you to reduce the number of officers of this Government, to reduce their salaries, to reduce the compensation of persons paid out of the Treasury of the United States, and to reduce the amount covered by the appropriation bill.

Will you gentlemen consent to deprive yourselves of these three powers? One step further. The provision of this proposed rule does not relate to the Committees on Appropriations alone, but the provision applies to other committees. It is as follows:

Provided, that it shall be in order further to amend such bill upon the report of a committee—

Other than the Committee on Appropriations, of course—having jurisdiction of the subject-matter of said amendment, which amendment being germane to the subject-matter of the bill shall retrench expenditures.

The first part of the rule is also a rule of the Senate; the latter clause is not in the Senate rule, but the first is. In this rule any other committee, having charge of a matter of legislation which may retrench expenditures, can offer an amendment on a pending appropriation bill.

Now, sir, the former rule was abolished in a contest which occurred on this side of the House in which it was not specially involved, because other matters were overriding it. It was abolished at the beginning of the Forty-ninth Congress. I think I could show to you gentlemen on this side of the House that this rule would not have been abolished had it not been for a contest that occurred on the tariff question in the Forty-ninth Congress. But this rule was abolished in the Forty-ninth Congress.

What has been the result of its abolition, the House depriving itself of the power to reduce appropriations? I will not point out the extent to which appropriations were increased at once, except to make this comparison.

Mr. BLOUNT. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope I shall be allowed further time.

Mr. BLAND. I ask that the gentleman be permitted to proceed without limit.

Mr. MCKENNA. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be allowed to proceed for ten minutes.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not ask unlimited time. Ten minutes is all I ask for.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request that the gentleman from Indiana be allowed to proceed ten minutes? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HOLMAN. There was but a slight increase in the Forty-fifth, Forty-sixth, and Forty-eighth Congresses. I admit there was a steady but not a large increase each year. But in the Forty-ninth Congress, after the abolition of the rule and from that time on there has been a startling increase in the appropriations made by Congress. Let me make a comparison here. I can not go into details. Let me make a comparison between the appropriations of thirteen years ago and now, and see whether there is any need of retrenchment in the expenditures of this Government.

Look at the appropriations to carry on this Government on the basis of the Forty-fourth Congress. I undertake to say here that this Government was never better administered, especially under a Republican Administration that came into power questionably, than during that period. The only men who complained of the withdrawal of that $63,705,423.18 of appropriation that remained in your Treasury were those who did not get the money. No public interest suffered. In the Forty-fourth Congress the appropriations were $299,145,788. In the last, the Fifty-first Congress two sessions)—I will leave out, of course, the permanent appropriations—they were $781,765,554.37, an increase of $482,000,000 in this brief period of time of thirteen years that ought to startle the people of this country.

For the first seventy-three years the expenditures did not reach $63,000,000, and yet in thirteen years you increase the expenditures of this Government to the enormous extent of over four hundred and eighty-two millions. Yet, gentlemen, the only chance you have to retrench, in the position of the House, with the Senate in opposition to it, even to the extent of a tithe of a hair, except in connection with some contingencies or deficiencies, is by conferring upon your committees, not on one committee, but on all the committees having charge of appropriation bills, the power to retrench by legislation on appropriation bills. Of course the abolition of an office is legislation; and, of course, you can not and will not legislate in that direction except on appropriation bills, and you have never done so. You can not retrench as to salaries, you can not retrench as to many other things, on the basis of existing laws except as to contingencies and the like.

Now, gentlemen, the cry is against "riders on appropriation bills;" and even as sagacious and prudent a gentlemen as my friend from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY], and my friend the distinguished gentleman from California [Mr. MCKENNA], declaim against riders on appropriation bills as unreasonable and exceptionally wicked. Let us see what occurred in the last Congress. They did not retrench. The House did not have the power to put a rider on an appropriation bill for retrenchment; but in both the first and second session they piled up the expenditures of this Government by legislation on appropriation bills.

We need not attempt to deceive ourselves. The intelligent people of this country understood before the first session of the Fifty-first Congress had expired how things were driving, and by that extraordinary cyclone which struck this country in 1890 showed that the public sense of duty was so aroused at the lavish expenditure that marked that Congress as to demand an immediate change in this House.

Let us see how they legislated, and I call the attention of my friend from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] and of my friend from California [Mr. MCKENNA] to the facts. They legislated "liberally" on appropriation bills. The Senate literally loaded down those bills with legislation. They created, on appropriation bills, 1,941 offices at an annual cost of $2,359,000. No complaint was made of that by you gentlemen, because that was legislation in the interest of extravagance; that was legislation in the interest of favored classes. And now we are to be deprived of the right to strike down, by legislation on appropriation bills, this enormous increase of public officials which was created by the last Congress on such bills.

By legislation on appropriation bills they increased salaries to the extent of $245,108; yet we are not to be permitted to reduce salaries by proper legislative provisions upon appropriation bills! It was all right for the Senate to load down your bills with increased salaries and to add nearly two thousand to the number of your public officials, but it will not do to permit the House of Representatives to put "riders" on appropriation bills to reduce those salaries or the number of those officials. Suppose we should bring in a bill here abolishing the most insignificant office; we should be met instantly with the point of order "that is legislation; and being legislation, it can not be considered, but must go out on the point of order."

Take a few cases for illustration of the increases made by legislation on appropriation bills. The salaries of five judges and of the chief justice of the supreme court of the District of Columbia were increased on an appropriation bill, the salary of the Commissioner of the Land Office was so increased; the salary of the Assistant Commissioner of the Land Office was increased; the salaries of thirty principal examiners in the Pension Office were increased, the salary of the chief clerk of the Land Office was increased; the salary of our minister to Turkey was increased from $7,000 to $10,000, and the salary of the minister to Mexico was increased from $12,000 to $17,000. Then, on appropriation bills in the last Congress, the office of Assistant Secretary of the Treasury was created, a proposition which has been heretofore resisted by the Democratic party, and also the offices of Assistant Secretary of War, Assistant Secretary of the Navy, and Assistant Attorney-General. A member of the Fortifications Board was added at a salary of $5,000, and a superintendent of charities in this city at a salary of $3,000.

The Zoölogical Park was created by legislation on an appropriation bill. I have here a list, covering a page, of legislation, independent of new offices and increases of salaries, that was made on appropriation bills in the last Congress.

LEGISLATION ON APPROPRIATION BILLS, FIFTY-FIRST CONGRESS.

Legislation authorizing segregation of irrigable lands in the arid region and for the selection of sites for reservoirs and reserving all such lands for sale, was had under a Senate amendment on the sundry civil appropriation act for 1889; and after an expenditure of $350,000 the said legislation was repealed and all entries of land made in violation thereof, but in good faith, were validated under a Senate amendment on the sundry civil appropriation act at the first session of the last Congress.

Limit of cost of public building at Milwaukee, Wis., increased from $1,200,000 to $1,600,000 by Senate amendment to sundry civil appropriation act for 1891.

Purchase of site for new building for Government Printing Office, to cost $250,000, authorized on sundry civil appropriation act for 1891, under a Senate amendment, and the same suspended under a Senate amendment to the last sundry civil appropriation act.

Method of taking property for public use in the District of Columbia, under condemnation proceedings by appraisement of three commissioners, to be appointed by the supreme court of the District, instead of by a jury, authorized under a Senate amendment to the sundry civil appropriation act for 1891.

Zoölogical Park authorized to be established at a cost of $200,000 on District of Columbia appropriation act for 1890 under a Senate amendment.

On the Indian appropriation act at the last session, by legislation under amendments of the Senate, seven different treaties were ratified, involving an expenditure of $5,626,290.75, and provision was made for the payment of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Indian claim, amounting to $2,991,450.

Provision on last pension appropriation act by Senate amendment regulating time of payment of pensions, Purchase of Butler Building at cost of $275,000; Maltby House at $138,000, and Richards property, occupied by Coast Survey, at $155,000; the latter two by Senate amendments authorized on last sundry civil appropriation act.

Action of Commissioners of the District of Columbia in granting permits for extension of buildings in Washington beyond building line and upon streets and avenues of said city ratified by legislation, under Senate amendment under last District of Columbia appropriation act, and such permits authorized hereinafter with the approval of the Secretary of War.

Payment of French spoliation claims, aggregating $1,304,404.46, authorized on last deficiency act by Senate amendment.

Legislative provision on last District of Columbia appropriation act relieving certain ex-Commissioners of the District from liability on accounts aggregating over $20,000, which had been suspended by the accounting officers.

Legislation extending limits of cost for public buildings at Buffalo, N. Y.; Birmingham, Ala., Burlington, Iowa; Mankato, Minn.; New Haven, Conn.; Pueblo, Colo., and San Francisco, Cal., was had on the last sundry civil appropriation act by Senate amendments thereto.

Yet my friends from Maine and from California grow indignant when it is proposed that this House shall arm itself with power to legislate in the interest of the people by reducing officers and salaries of officers in the very same manner by which they were increased. Gentlemen, if you arm your committees, your Committee on Indian Affairs, your Committee on Naval Affairs, your Committee on Military Affairs, your Committee on Foreign Affairs, and your Appropriations Committee with powers to report to this House legislation to the reasonable extent proposed in this provision and cordially sustain the reports made in the interests of economy you can go confidently before the people in the coming contest, because you will have carried out the pledges made by the Democrats in the contest of the year before last, which terminated with such satisfactory results.

But where will there be any retrenchment or the opportunity for retrenchment if you do not permit the power to do it? Will my friend from Louisiana [Mr. BOATNER] suggest to me some mode by which we can retrench the expenditures of this Government without some such provision in our rules as this? How will you abolish any office? How will you reduce any salary?

Mr. BOATNER. By legislation to that effect.

Mr. HOLMAN. Legislation! You pass a bill here to abolish any one of the one thousand nine hundred offices created by the last Congress upon appropriation bills, and does the gentleman believe it will ever see light in the Senate?

Mr. BOATNER. And by this means you get the small fish which are not worthy the attention of the Senate, and the big fish you pass by, and your bill comes back here from the Senate disagreed to and the House has to recede. That is the way it works.

Mr. HOLMAN. Well, will my friend suggest some case where a salary has ever been reduced by the Senate except by legislation upon an appropriation bill placed there by the House.

Mr. WALKER. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. WALKER. Does the gentleman say, or does he mean to intimate, that he proposes by legislation on appropriation bills to force the Senate to legislate as he desires by a threat to starve the Government? Is that what you mean? Why don't you do it by direct legislation?

Mr. HOLMAN. Oh, yes! I have heard that speech before.

Mr. WALKER. That does not answer the question.

Mr. HOLMAN. I know; but my friend must indulge me in saying that I have heard that speech before, and generally from gentlemen who in a short time afterwards, like the Arabs alluded to yesterday by the gentleman from California [Mr. MCKENNA], "folded their tents and silently stole away." [Laughter.]

Mr. WALKER. I think you have silently stolen away once or twice from this House.

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, once or twice; but I have come back. [Laughter.]

Mr. WALKER. Which I have not yet had to do. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOLMAN. Now, will my friend from Louisiana [Mr. BOATNER], who has had considerable experience in legislation here, and has also studied the history of our legislation, point to a single instance where, on a separate bill, an office has been abolished when the two branches of Congress have stood as they stand now, the one branch controlled by one party and the other party controlling the other branch of Congress and the Executive, or where the Republican party controlled both Houses?

Mr. PICKLER. Will the gentleman from Indiana permit me a question?

Mr. HOLMAN. My friend must excuse me until I say an additional word in reply to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER]. I do not know that one legislative branch of the Government can be said to "force" another when they express to that other branch their views in regard to the public expenditures. It must be remembered that there are only two great matters in a Government like ours in a time of peace—only two. It is strange enough, but it is a fact, and those two matters are the getting of money from the people into the Treasury and spending that money. Has the Senate more right to ask the House to increase expenditures than the House has to ask the Senate to reduce expenditures? Would either be forcing the other?

Now, does my friend think it improper that one branch of the legislative department of the Government should say to the other that the public expenditures are too great and ought to be reduced? Suppose it be done even in the sense expressed by the gentleman's language, does not the Senate feel the same interest in carrying on this Government that we do? The Executive is under its control. The Senate, as I have stated, has not hesitated to create nineteen hundred new offices on appropriation bills during the last Congress on appropriation bills. May we not justly demand their abolition on appropriation bills?

Mr. BOATNER. Was that correct? Was it right to do it?

Mr. HOLMAN. It was not right, because it was not right to create them at all. Sir, I gloried in the report which has been read by all of you, showing, session by session the appropriations made during the first half century of our existence as a General Government—I gloried in that report at the end of the first half century, and so did you, because it showed that during the closing year of that half century no office had been created and no salary increased. That is a legend worthy of the best days of the Republic. How does the case stand now? As I have said, we find that during a single Congress, upon appropriations bills, nineteen hundred and forty-one new officers were created and a great many salaries increased.

Yet gentlemen make objection to this policy of putting "riders" on appropriation bills for the purpose of retrenchment—to save the people's money—money which has been worked for by them. Gentlemen say it is wrong to invest any committee of the House with power to provide on appropriation bills for reduction of salaries or abolition of offices. My friend from Louisiana [Mr. BOATNER] can not possibly take anything by the question he put to me; for no instance has occurred, at least during this generation, where any salary has been increased by an independent bill. The gentleman certainly must know that under the existing state of things, as Congress is now compelled to deal with it, such a thing would be impossible.

I thank the House for indulging me so long; I will not detain it further.

Mr. PICKLER. Before the gentleman takes his seat I would like to ask him one question. Does he think that as an independent proposition it is good policy to increase the power of the Appropriations Committee in this House and give it greater control of legislation?

Mr. HOLMAN. The same consideration applies to all the other appropriations committees. There are six of them. Is my friend opposed to reducing salaries, is he opposed to abolishing needless offices, is he opposed to retrenching expenditures? If he is opposed to those three things, he ought to vote to strike out this provision; otherwise he should support it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. PICKLER. That is the gentleman's statement of the question; not mine.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. 217) to amend an act entitled "An act for the construction of a railroad and wagon bridge across the Mississippi River at South St. Paul, Minn., approved April 26, 1890.

It also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which concurrence was requested:

A bill (S. 2) for the relief of Ezra S. Havens;

A bill (S. 3) for the relief of Napoleon B. Giddings;

A bill (S. 4) for the relief of Alfred J. Worcester;

A bill (S. 5) for the relief of John S. Neet, jr.;

A bill (S. 6) for the relief of Joseph W. Carmack;

A bill (S. 408) to provide for the purchase of a site, and the erection of a public building thereon, at Fernandina, in the State of Florida;

A bill (S. 539) to amend and enlarge the act approved June 18, 1878, entitled "An act to provide for the distribution of the awards made under the convention between the United States of America and the Republic of Mexico, concluded on the 4th day of July, 1868;

A bill (S. 591) to provide for the erection of a public building in the city of Grand Forks, N. Dak.; and

A bill (S. 606) to amend and enlarge the act approved June 18, 1878, entitled "An act to provide for the distribution of the awards made under the convention between the United States of America and the Republic of Mexico, concluded on the 4th day of July, 1868.

THE RULES.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, as I wish to occupy the floor a little more than five minutes, I request, before beginning my remarks, that I may be allowed the same length of time which has been occupied by the gentleman from Indiana.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] asks unanimous consent that he may be permitted to speak for twenty minutes.

Mr. DINGLEY. I do not think I shall occupy so much time as that.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, this question is so important that I trust the House will give it careful and candid consideration. The most important part of the provision reported by the Committee on Rules is:

That it shall be in order further to amend such bill—

An appropriation bill—

upon the report of the committee having jurisdiction of the subject-matter of such amendment, which amendment, being germane to the subject-matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures.

This, it will be seen, Mr. Speaker, is a proposition to allow as an amendment to an appropriation bill, on the report of the committee having the subject-matter in charge, any proposition, including even a proposition pending before the House. This provision authorizing new legislation on appropriation bills was never before proposed in this sweeping form to the House of Representatives. It is not the rule which existed in the Forty-eighth Congress and in previous Congresses as far back as the Forty-fourth. It drops from the rule which then prevailed a limitation of an exceedingly important character. The rule of the Forty-eighth Congress, which the gentleman from Indiana has intimated he desires to reëstablish, contained as a limitation upon the right of amendment to an appropriation bill this provision:

No bill or resolution shall at any time be amended by annexing thereto or incorporating therewith the substance of any other bill or resolution pending before the House.

Now, the gentleman from Indiana, who seems to have controlled the presentation of this proposition, has succeeded in eliminating the limitation which alone made such a rule possible in any prior Congress. He proposes to open up every appropriation bill to amendments which may consist of any bill pending in the House, either before one of the committees or upon the Calendar, provided on the face they seem to reduce expenditures. To this extent not even the Forty-sixth or the Forty-eighth Congress ever went.

A more vicious proposition can not possibly be imagined. Why, just think of it for a moment. Consider the condition in which the House would find itself operating under such a rule as that. The legislative appropriation bill has been reported; general debate has been concluded upon it, and after the debate has been concluded and the consideration of the bill is proceeding by paragraphs under the five-minute rule, some gentleman is recognized who is authorized by his committee to offer a bill which is pending before the House of the most important character, by way of amendment. That bill can not be considered except under the five-minute rule.

Now, does the House seriously propose to put itself into the position, when an appropriation bill is under consideration, of having launched upon it, after the conclusion of the general debate, and while the House is considering its paragraphs under the five-minute rule, the most important bill that can possibly be conceived that may be pending before the House—a bill of which the House has had no previous notice? Why, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that such a proposition is so remarkable for a deliberative body that it can not be maintained for a single moment. It goes farther than was ever before suggested by any rule of the House.

But beyond that I think experience has shown that no principle is more vicious in legislation than that which allows upon an appropriation bill amendments incorporating new legislation. We have tried that experiment in previous Houses. It was tried in the Forty-fourth Congress, and in the Forty-eighth Congress in a modified form, not in the form proposed here; and yet at the opening of the Forty-ninth Congress the gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. CARLISLE, then Speaker of the House, the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. Morrison, then the leader on the Democratic side of the House, and other gentlemen whom I named in remarks which I submitted the other day to the House, all joined in advocating the abrogation of that rule and the adoption of a provision that no new legislation should be allowed upon the appropriation bills.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. DINGLEY. Certainly.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does not my friend understand that under this rule no provision can be put upon an appropriation bill that changes existing law except a provision that reduces salaries, abolishes offices, or reduces the aggregate carried by the bill—in other words, that it must retrench expenditures?

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Indiana, with his long experience, must know that it does not require an expert to so frame a bill as will remodel, for instance, the Supreme Court. A force bill even might be prepared which may seem to retrench expenditures upon its face, and subsequently, when the bill is under consideration and in order as an amendment to the pending appropriation bill, amendments may be made to the amendment to an unlimited extent.

My friend will understand, for I have assisted in framing too many bills myself not to be aware of the fact, that the rule will not stand in the way of interposing any legislative measure as an amendment to an appropriation bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does the gentleman know of any instance in his experience within the twelve years when this rule was in operation where it accomplished the result he suggests—that is, the rule which is now proposed?

Mr. DINGLEY. Oh, not at all; this rule is very different.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is exactly the same rule, in the same words.

Mr. DINGLEY. In the Forty-eighth Congress there was an important limitation upon what is now proposed.

Mr. HOLMAN. Oh, yes; from the Forty-fifth to the Forty-eighth Congress this rule prevailed.

Mr. DINGLEY. But in the Forty-eighth Congress a limitation was put upon it.

Mr. HOLMAN. The rule now proposed is the rule of the Forty-eighth Congress.

Mr. DINGLEY. Not at all. Allow me to read the rule of the Forty-eighth Congress. I have it here before me. After the proviso, as it appears in the rule now reported to the House, namely:

Provided, That it shall be in order further to amend such bill upon the report of the committee having jurisdiction of the subject-matter of such amendment, which amendment, being germane to the subject-matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures.

The rule of the Forty-eighth Congress goes on to limit its application, as follows:

No bill or resolution shall at any time be amended by annexing thereto or incorporating therewith the substance of any other bill or resolution pending before the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is simply a modification of the rule.

Mr. DINGLEY. It was a very material change of the rule. It alters its whole character.

Mr. HOLMAN. There is no objection to that provision to which the gentleman refers now, but the other provision which he has been discussing has been in operation for many years in our system.

Mr. DINGLEY. Now, Mr. Speaker, a word further with reference to this matter. I think in all parliamentary procedure there is no principle that has been better established as one of wisdom than that appropriation bills should be confined to the proper and legitimate object of such a bill, namely, to carry out the provisions of existing law.

Mr. HOLMAN. Did my friend object to that provision in the last Congress?

Mr. DINGLEY. I did not hear the gentleman.

Mr. HOLMAN. Did my friend from Maine object to the riders when they were increasing the expenditures of the House largely in the last Congress?

Mr. DINGLEY. Certainly. I have always objected to new legislation upon appropriation bills.

Mr. HOLMAN. I did not observe it.

Mr. DINGLEY. I repeat, I have always objected to new legislation upon appropriation bills.

Mr. HOLMAN. Now, my friend knows that the purchase of the great hotel over here and the Butler House and other expenditures of that kind, amounting to a half a million of dollars, were put on appropriation bills. Did the gentleman say a word about it?

Mr. DINGLEY. Those amendments were made by the Senate, and this rule does not prevent the Senate from making any amendment which it sees fit. It does not reach the difficulty at all.

Mr. HOLMAN. But we are asking that the House shall take the proper action in the matter anyhow.

Mr. DINGLEY. The gentleman knows that since the Forty-eighth Congress a rule of this House has been in force which provides that no legislation can be put on a bill in the House except by unanimous consent, and if any new legislation has gone in it in this House, it has gone in by the consent of the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HOLMAN. Ah, the Senate has put them on.

Mr. DINGLEY. Your rule does not hit that case at all.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I think that no principle has been better established than that new legislation on appropriation bills is essentially vicious.

The gentleman has argued that it is necessary to do this in order to reduce expenditures. The gentleman from Indiana, chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, may reduce the amounts appropriated in any direction that he sees fit, with the concurrence of the committee and of the House; but he wants to change existing law.

Mr. HOLMAN. We want to abolish some offices.

Mr. DINGLEY. Then let that be done by a bill introduced and referred to an appropriate committee in the regular way.

Mr. HOLMAN. Did such a bill ever pass in the history of Congress?

Mr. DINGLEY. Such a bill would be more likely to become a law than in the manner proposed by this rule. I suppose the object of introducing such measures into appropriation bills is to coerce the Senate into agreeing to them.

Mr. HOLMAN. To persuade the Senate, as we represent the public will better than they.

Mr. DINGLEY. His object is to coerce the Senate. If that is not the object, why will not separate bills be sufficient?

Mr. HOLMAN. They coerced us in the last Congress, did they not?

Mr. DINGLEY. I must object to having my time taken up by continual interruptions.

Mr. HOLMAN. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. DINGLEY. The gentleman very well understands, and I ask the attention of the House to this point, that the Senate, without distinction of party, have always taken the ground that they would not accept an amendment in the nature of new legislation designed to coerce them. There has been no difference of opinion upon that among Senators, whether Republican or Democratic. The gentleman proceeds to tack on legislation which he claims will reduce expenditures. It goes over to the Senate. Now let me say to the gentleman that the Senate will at once take the ground that, if new legislation is to be proposed of that important character, it should be sent over on a bill involving simply that proposition, and they will refuse to concur in the amendment, not on the ground of the propriety or impropriety of it, but on the ground that it is an attempt to coerce the Senate; and the gentleman knows that has been the fate of all such amendments.

Mr. HOLMAN. But they coerced us during the last session.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hopes the gentleman from Maine will be allowed to proceed in order.

Mr. DINGLEY. I do not want gentlemen on the other side to be misled by the appeals of my friend from Indiana to do that which he says will secure economy. If the gentleman from Indiana wants to reduce any salary, if he wants to abolish any office, let him introduce a bill for that purpose. We have committees especially designed for that purpose. Let them consider the bills and report them to this House, and then, if there is any desire to pass those bills, all that you have to do is to ask the Committee on Rules to pass a special order providing for the consideration of these bills and carry them through, and the Senate will be compelled to meet the issue that you make in that way.

But if you put issues in the shape of new legislation on appropriation bills, the Senate will not meet them, but they will simply say that they will not be coerced in that way, and the Democratic Senators will take the same ground as the Republican Senators. We have had that time and again. Nothing can be accomplished in any such way, as the gentleman from Indiana must well understand in view of the experience of the past.

I want to say in this connection that we had a thorough discussion of this subject in the Forty-ninth Congress. A rule, not so sweeping as this, as I have already suggested, had existed for three or four Congresses, and yet this House by a vote of 269 to 55, a Democratic House, struck out the very rule, as it then existed, which the gentleman from Indiana now seeks to have reestablished in a form such as was never before known.

In that debate I remember very well that under the leadership of the then Speaker of the House, Mr. CARLISLE, Mr. Morrison upon the floor, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT], the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT], and other gentlemen took the ground all through that no good could be accomplished that way, and that the effect would be to clog the appropriation bills with extraneous matter. I have seen this House, under the operation of a rule not so stringent as that now proposed, for three days occupied on the consideration of a point of order as to whether a proposed amendment came under the rule.

I want to say to gentlemen on both sides of this House, in the utmost candor, that if this rule shall be adopted, and this House shall be launched upon the business of enacting legislation as riders on appropriation bills, that neither July, nor August, nor September, nor October even will see the end of this session and the passage of the appropriation bills. I want to say to gentlemen that I do not wish again to see what we have seen before under a rule not so drastic as that which the gentleman proposes to this House.

If we adopt such a rule we shall find ourselves launched into a discussion of amendments thrust upon the House at a moment's notice, amendments which provoke more than mere party division, which will provoke divisions entirely outside of party lines; amendments which, if adopted by this House, will lead to the suspension of appropriation bills until the controversies that have arisen can be decided in some other way. Therefore, I beg gentlemen, in the interest of orderly procedure, of economy, of good government, and of patriotic ends not to place in the rules a provision that opens up such a Pandora's box of evil. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, complaint is made that the expenses of the Government are unreasonable, and, if true, it requires the majority of this House to take such methods as will enable it to make a reduction in those expenditures. If this House shall now deny to itself the power, and the only power by which it can accomplish it, by the adoption of this rule, all the declamation about retrenching expenditures will go for naught when the sum of our work shall be ascertained. It has been said by my friend who has just taken his seat [Mr. DINGLEY] that legislation on appropriation bills is exceedingly unwise, and has generally been condemned. I undertake, sir, to say that not a Congress has lived throughout its term whose appropriation bills did not contain a contradiction of that statement. In the Forty-fourth Congress the amount carried by the appropriation bills had been reduced by the House of Representatives, before sending them to the Senate, to the amount of $43,000,000.

The same declamation against the unwisdom of such legislation obtained then as now. Senators of the United States proclaimed the doctrine, that it was the most iniquitous method of legislation, and that it was without precedent. There stood up in the Senate the distinguished Senator from Ohio (Mr. SHERMAN], meeting and taking issue with his political friends, holding citations of almost hundreds of instances where legislation had been passed on appropriation bills, and assuring his friends about him that they could not answer this question in that way, saying, "We can not answer this question in that way; our record is the other."

Therefore, it is perfectly idle for us to talk about the unwisdom of legislation on appropriation bills where the public interest demands that we should reduce the expenditures.

Sir, let us provide for such a reasonable reduction on the appropriation bills as is competent under this amendment. Let us send them to the Senate of the United States. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER] says, "Do you propose to starve the Government by saying to the Senate, 'We mean to starve the Government if you do not agree to these amendments.'" We made no such proposition to the Senate in the Forty-fourth Congress. We went along making these reductions, and when they were proclaimed and went to the Senate the struggle was long, but the result was $30,000,000 per annum reduction.

Why all this quibbling, if you are in earnest; if you mean to do anything there is but one way to do it. The Departments will declaim against most of these reductions, and our friends on the other side will declaim against them; but if you wish to retrench the expenditures, you have only one thing to do, and that is to retrench; and the only way you can do it is by legislation on appropriation bills. You may have bills introduced that will repeal offices and you may put them on the Calendar, and how will you reach them? Perhaps by special order. When such measures go to the Senate they are laid aside. We have tried it in the past; but if put on an appropriation bill the Senate will be estopped from denying it as unwise, for they have been doing it all the time. They will be compelled to take cognizance of these propositions; and if they do not, and we shall have to conclude the session without accomplishing anything, we will go to the people with the manifestation and a demonstration of our efforts to accomplish it..

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. PEEL. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be permitted to proceed for five minutes longer.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request, that the gentleman be permitted to speak for five minutes longer? The Chair hears none.

Mr. BLOUNT. Now, Mr. Speaker, what further as to this amendment? What does it propose to do?

Salaries have been increased by both sides of the House. Both parties have erred in that respect since the period of the Forty-fourth Congress. I do not claim for my own party organization that it has not tolerated such increases. Both sides, I repeat, are responsible for it. But, as in the Forty-fourth Congress we were confronted with the question of reducing expenditures, or, failing in that, with the question of a possible increase of taxation, so to-day the issue has been raised in this House and in serious form, whether or not, with our present system of taxation, there will not probably be a deficit, which will confront us later, with the prospect of increased taxation.

If this is true, sir, let us first make the effort to economize; let us endeavor to retrench expenditures before we even tolerate the idea of imposing additional burdens of taxation upon the people. Here is a proposition to furnish us a means to reduce salaries. Let the Committee on Appropriations, having jurisdiction of that subject in their legislative bill, taking no power away from any other committee, make recommendations to us to that effect.

Again, sir, in the matter of the compensation of contractors and other persons to be paid out of the appropriations made by that bill, I have in mind, and the fact is familiar to many gentlemen here, that, in the matter of the transportation of the mails, while freight rates have been reduced perhaps as much as 50 per cent since the commencement of the operation of the present law, yet, by reason of our inability to have propositions reducing the compensation for carrying the mails enacted into law upon appropriation bills, the old rate has prevailed until perhaps twenty-five or thirty, or even fifty, million dollars have been paid out that ought not to have been paid.

Now, if the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads shall see fit to recommend to this House in that one item a reduction of $2,000,000, how is that reduction to be accomplished? Let us suppose that the committee report a separate bill covering that one item and it goes upon the Calendar, will you get a special order with reference to that bill? Will you adopt that course and go through all the usual routine and pass your special bill and send it over to the Senate, merely that it may be pigeonholed there? Why not allow the rate of compensation to be fixed on the appropriation bill, and thereby challenge the Senate to keep up the present exorbitant rates?

This report provides, in addition to this, that it shall be further in order to amend such a bill upon the report of a committee having jurisdiction of the same. Now, sir, you have your committees organized in direct relation to the great Departments of this great Government; your Committee on Naval Affairs, your Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, your Committee on Indian Affairs, your Committee on Military Affairs, and all the rest. They may recommend legislation which, by direct operation, will largely reduce expenditure. The Committee on Appropriations can not touch it. This provision in the rules entirely preserves to the committees their jurisdiction. The committees specially charged with each separate subject-matter by the House, and those committees alone, will have the right to propose amendments to the bill.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker, the subject of this amendment or rule is not a new one to the people of the United States. The question of the propriety of incorporating legislation upon appropriation bills has been, to my own knowledge, a matter of discussion for the last twenty years at least. It may not be of any particular interest to the House, and for myself I do not attach so much importance to the mere matter of individual consistency in regard to legislation as some of the citations made here to-day would indicate that other gentleman do; but, as an illustration of the fact to which I have adverted, that this question of the propriety or advisability of using the appropriation bills of Congress as the vehicle for carrying through, by the momentum of the public necessity, indiscriminate measures of legislation, has been before the American people for a long time. I will state that as far back as 1873 the question was discussed and public sentiment had become so focused in regard to it in my own State that the Republican State convention of that year adopted the following resolution, of which, although not a member of the convention, I was the author:

Resolved, That the practice of loading the appropriation bills essential to the Government with objectionable legislation in the shape of amendments toward the close of the session is a prolific source of abuse and a fraud upon the people, and its reform is urgently demanded.

I believe that utterance to be as true and as pertinent to-day as it was when it received the unanimous sanction of a great Republican convention in my State.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to advert briefly to another expression on this subject from another section of the country, which possibly—I might perhaps say undoubtedly—will carry more weight with the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT], who has just taken his seat, than the citation of a resolution prepared by myself and adopted by a Republican State convention in the Northeastern State of Maine. In looking over the record of the discussion of this question in this House in 1880, when it was proposed to revive a rule identical with this—identical in purpose, if not in language—I find that among the distinguished gentlemen who then warned Congress against the evils resulting from such methods of legislation was Hon. Alexander H. Stephens, of Georgia, then a member of this body; and from the very pertinent and cogent remarks of that gentleman I desire, with the permission of the House, to read the following:

I was opposed to that Rule XXI as reported, individually. The right was reserved to us all to oppose its adoption as it stands. Every member of the committee, by mutual agreement, could move any amendment he pleased, or speak or vote against any part of the report which was not carried by unanimity. I was opposed to this rule as it stands in our present system. And why? I do not believe, according to democratic doctrine, Jeffersonian, Madisonian, Jacksonian, and Jeffersonian republicanism also, that it was ever intended that appropriation bills should be encumbered by any other legislation than appropriations. Never, sir!

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BOUTELLE. I trust that I may be allowed a few minutes more.

Mr. BYNUM and Mr. GOODNIGHT asked that Mr. BOUTELLE'S time be extended.

There was no objection.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I read further from the language of Mr. Stephens on the occasion to which I have referred:

If there has been any progress in this country in legislation it has been in precluding from appropriation bills the incorporation of matters upon them as riders. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Hurd], if I understood him correctly, the other day said that it was the Democratic doctrine to seek redress of grievances by withholding appropriations, standing upon British precedents.

If that be his position—and I so understood it—I repudiate it toto cælo. Never was there any such doctrine announced in any authorized democratic creed I ever heard of. It has its origin in a monarchical government, where there is no written constitution. This doctrine came from England. Withholding appropriations there has been, and is to-day, a legitimate mode of seeking redress of grievances, because that is a monarchy. Powers are not divided there as here. We live under a government founded upon a written constitution; we live in a free representive republic. Here sovereignty does not reside in a crown. There (in England) all sovereign powers are considered as inherent in the Crown; and the Commons, the representatives of the people, for centuries, in granting supplies, which is their right, have held the power in their hands to withhold them until their grievances have been redressed. In this way the petition of right, if you please, habeas corpus, or any other of the great and essential rights of British subjects, were secured, from Magna Charta down, and of which American citizens may well be proud to-day.

But, sir, we live under a different form of government. Ours is a written constitution.

Then he goes on to enforce the very palpable distinction between the condition of things as affecting this question under a monarchical form of government and under our own. He then continues in language to which I ask the particular attention of my friends on the other side:

I am, as I have said, against all political riders, so called, upon appropriation bills, and such riders as are intended to coerce executive action. In this I think I am maintaining nothing but what the advanced thought of the age in political science the world over has already arrived at. I say here that in my sixteen years of experience in Congress, before the late separation or war, more corruption and the most mischievous of all legislation which ever occurred during that time, so far as I am aware, came from riders or amendments to appropriation bills—amendments that could not be passed on their own merits. So greatly was this recognized as the fact, that when those members of the old Congress met in Montgomery to make a new constitution, as the gentleman from Michigan referred to it the other day, one of the great wants, as we thought, and I acting my part in it thought, was in that fundamental law to put "the sting of disability in the temptation," to use the language of my able and most distinguished colleague on that occasion [Mr. Toombs], in the very constitution of the republic.

The first constitution, made for one year—the provisional constitution—had a provision, which was referred to by the gentleman from Michigan the other day, in these words, which I will ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

"The President may veto any appropriation or appropriations, and approve any other appropriation or appropriations in the same bill"—Article I, section 5, paragraph 1.

A provision which manifestly was for the purpose of preventing the use of appropriation bills to carry through objectionable legislation.

But I ask the attention of my friend from Georgia, the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, to one other and very pertinent citation, so far as the gentleman is concerned, from the language of Mr. Stephens:

I stated that I was but maintaining the advanced thought of civilization in the science of government. Why, sir, a number of the States of this Union—how many I really do not know—have taken the lead in this matter. I am but following in their footsteps. I am told by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Whitthorne] that that State has incorporated a similar provision in its constitution. I send to the desk and the Clerk will please read what is the provision of the constitution of Georgia.

The Clerk read as follows:

"The general appropriation bill shall embrace nothing except appropriations fixed by previous law, the ordinary expenses of the executive, legislative, and judicial departments of the government, payment of the public debt and interest thereon, and for the support of public institutions and the educational interests of the State. All other appropriations shall be made by separate bills, each embracing but one subject,—Georgia Constitution, 1877, article 3, section 7, paragraph 9.

I commend this provision to the attention of the gentleman from Georgia.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I hope the rule reported by the Committee on Rules will pass just as it stands. Junius more than a hundred years ago declared that the freedom of the press was the palladium of English liberty. But all the historians tell us that the power to put a rider on an appropriation bill has been more the palladium of English liberty than the freedom of the press or anything else. Why, sir, the assertion of that right brought on the revolutions in England and not only established but maintained free citizenship. The representatives of the people in the House of Commons claimed on any and every occasion when necessary that they would grant no public money except on the condition that the constitutional rights of the citizen should be respected, including the right of economy in public expenditures.

Sir, we have copied the example thus set. All the English-speaking peoples have copied it, and it has achieved more good in this country than any other weapon used in legislative warfare; for legislation is but compromise, or what might be called mimic war of the mind instead of actual conflict by physical warfare of the body.

Sir, "riders" on appropriation bills may well be said to be the bayonets of legislation. And one of the greatest generals the world ever saw relied mostly on the bayonet to snatch victory from defeat. On one occasion when he was told that the day was going against him, he said, "We will give them the bayonet." He did give them the bayonet, and turned the tide of battle in his favor. And just so in legislation where two political parties exist, each having a negative on the other in separate lawmaking bodies.

How can either party force the other to do right except by legislating upon appropriation bills? Even where the two Houses of our National Legislature are under the control of the same party, one has no effectual check on the other except by recourse to riders on appropriation bills. But we have three concurring negatives in our legislation—the House, the Senate, the President. Hence, when one political party fosters extravagance and corruption, as the Republican President and Senate are doing now, how can the Democratic party correct the abuses except by legislative riders? In other words, the Republican party is oppressing the people of this country exactly like the Kings of England used to do until the Commons would cut off supplies; and this Democratic House will be derelict in duty if it shall fail to lighten taxes, curtail expenditures, and put more money into circulation. We have only party government, and can have nothing else as long as universal suffrage prevails—one party, the "ins," struggling to maintain itself in the honors and emoluments of office as well as in the exercise of the faculties of government, while the other party, the "outs," will struggle equally hard to recapture the offices and regain control of the Government, to enact its laws, levy its taxes, and appropriate its revenues.

For this reason there are but two and can be but two dominant political parties in any free country, and if the large Democratic majority here are voluntarily going forward to manacle themselves, after the people commissioned them to rebuke the "billion-dollar" Congress—I say, if this large majority are going to put handcuffs on their wrists, fetters on their feet, and a collar around their necks, so as to enable a Republican President and a Republican Senate to laugh them to scorn and drive them to submit to a continuance of the extravagant appropriations of the last Congress, in the name of God, what did we Democrats come here for? I repeat the question, what were we sent here for but to curtail expenditures and rebuke the billion-dollar extravagance? [Applause.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from South Carolina be permitted to proceed for five minutes longer.

There was no objection.

Mr. MILLS. I do not object to the gentleman proceeding, but wish to ask, before he resumes his remarks, if it is the intention of the gentleman having this measure in control to secure a vote on this proposition to-night.

Mr. McMILLIN. The gentleman from Mississippi is not in his seat, but I will state to the gentleman that we do not expect to have a vote on this provision this afternoon.

Mr. MILLS. Then let that be the understanding. I have made the inquiry for the benefit of a number of gentlemen around me.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. Speaker, the facts, the history, and the philosophy involved in this proposition would require so much time that I can not undertake to go into them now; but I must appeal to my Democratic brethren here, do not, when you have the power, do not, when the people sent you here to exercise that power, let the Republicans dictate to you what you shall do.

Above all, gentlemen, I appeal to you, do not let them continue the extravagant and corrupt appropriations of the last Congress and let you all go home in helpless imbecility, to poke around amongst your constituents with your finger in your mouth whining, "We Democrats could not do anything because it would have been wrong to legislate on appropriation bills, although the Republicans used to do it." [Laughter and applause.] On the contrary, let us, like brave men, worthy of the confidence of the people, do what we were sent here to do, which was to reduce the appropriations, abolish sinecure offices, and curtail extravagant expenditures, as well as put more money into circulation. Why, Mr. Speaker, they created so many fat and useless offices in the last Congress that in several Departments now they are actually in one another's way, each one waiting on the other and nobody getting fatigued except in the unavailing search of trying to find something to do. [Laughter.]

Ah, Mr. Speaker, I know why this proposed rule hurts. In the Forty-fourth Congress the Democratic party reduced public expenditures over $60,000,000 under this rule. The Democratic party then went to the country with Tilden as its candidate for the Presidency, and he was elected solely upon the economic record of the Democratic party. [Applause on the Democratic side.] It is true the Republicans stole the office from him [laughter], but just repeat the same record now that the Democracy achieved in the Forty-fourth Congress and a Democrat will be President after the 4th of next March, a Democratic Senate will be at the other end of this building, and a Democratic House will occupy this Chamber. Ay, they have got that precedent in their memory, and they hope you will not repeat the precedent and will not follow it. But I implore you to do so, and let us declare what we came here for. Stand by your colors, as that fellow from Texas did at the St. Louis convention. What was his name?

A MEMBER. Flanagan.

Mr. TILLMAN. Yes, Flanagan, and he was a Republican, too. [Laughter.] He said, "If we are not here for the offices, what in the hell are we here for?" And so I say to you, my Democratic brethren, if we are not here to abolish sinecures, reduce salaries, and achieve retrenchment in the way of expenditures in a thousand directions that went wrong in the last House, then in the name of Heaven what did the people send us here for? [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. LYNCH. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the third subdivision of Rule XXI as reported by the Committee on Rules, and in doing so I am conscious of the risk of antagonizing the report made by a majority of the Committee on Rules of this side of the House, and know that I will meet the opposition of a very large number of gentlemen who occupy seats on this side. But I can not without protest sit here and acquiesce in the adoption of that rule, which, Mr. Speaker, is a step in the wrong direction.

It is not a political question, nor can I see how either party may be affected for better or worse by the adoption of the rule. We are here to legislate, not for one party or for the other, but for the interests of the whole country; and if this rule will prevent us from legislating for the whole country it ought not to be adopted. We are not now discussing a buncombe resolution that we may avoid to-morrow or next week, as was said of the resolution passed here a short time ago, but we are enacting a law, and in that sense it behooves us to use our best judgment as to what ought to be done with the proposition here presented.

The first proposition of the proposed rule is as follows:

No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill or be in order as an amendment thereto which does not retrench expenses.

Now, do you propose that we shall tie ourselves up here and make it impossible to amend any appropriation bill by putting on an amendment which we all agree ought to be put on? Shall we render ourselves powerless to legislate, when we all agree that such legislation is necessary? What is there about the composition of this House that makes us suspicious of each other or suspicious of the House, that we must gag ourselves at the commencement, and notify the country that instead of going forward and doing that which may seem for the best interest of the country we shall go backward? I propose to strike out the whole of the third subdivision.

Mr. HOLMAN. That question is not before us.

Mr. BLOUNT. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. LYNCH. I can not yield, as my time is too limited.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. LYNCH. I can see no necessity for casting that suspicion upon this House or upon each other, proclaiming to the country that we dare not trust ourselves on matters of legislation as they come up; proclaiming that we must limit ourselves lest we might be extravagant, and announcing to our Democratic friends and the country at large that the only safety of the country is in tying ourselves hand and foot and turning this body over to the tender mercy of the Committee on Appropriations. As a party measure, I insist that the Democratic party needs no such declaration of its faith to the economical administration of the affairs of the Government; but from the argument we have heard so far, it would seem as though many members considered that this House is a quasi banking corporation, to be judged solely by the amount of dividends declared at the end of the year.

The time of Mr. LYNCH having expired, on motion of Mr. BUTLER it was extended for five minutes.

Mr. LYNCH. This rule was enforced, as I understand from the discussion, all through from the Forty-fourth to the Forty-eighth Congresses, inclusive, and at the beginning of the Forty-ninth Congress it was rejected by the Democrats themselves. I do not agree with the gentleman from Indiana when he says that under the salutary provisions of this rule the expenses were cut down in the Forty-fifth Congress about $60,000,000 from what they were in the Forty-fourth; but gave no comparative estimate of unusual or incidental expenses in either the Forty-fourth or Forty-fifth, nor did he claim that the reduction made by the Forty-fifth Congress was due in whole or in part to that rule. The best record made by any two Congresses in America was that made by the Forty-ninth and Fiftieth Congresses, when they amassed a surplus of more than $100,000,000, and quietly turned it over to our Republican friends to blow it in the next year.

A MEMBER. And they blew it.

Mr. LYNCH. And they blew it. The Forty-ninth and Fiftieth Congresses did not have this rule. They rejected it at the organization of the Forty-ninth Congress by a very emphatic Democratic vote, and got along without it. They made, as I said before, the best record for economy that was made by any Congress up to that time, without the aid of this beneficent rule. The people are going to judge us here by what we do and not by what we promise to do. We can make all the declarations of economy and all the propositions of retrenchment we please, but they will judge us by what we do and not by what we resolve, as was done here the other day.

The second provision of this rule is equally as stringent as the first. Under its terms no appropriation in any such bill or amendment thereto changing existing law shall be in order except such as, being germane to the subject-matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures, as though it was only by amendment to an appropriation bill that retrenchment could be made at all. Retrenchment must be made by an affirmative act, not only of this House, but of the Senate, and with the sanction of the President.

But I do not understand that our duties here, Mr. Speaker, are to be limited, confined, and restricted to the one solitary question of dollars and cents. We are not going to be judged upon our return home by our record as to whether we defeated a few amendments on appropriation bills or not. We will be judged by our actions, by our patriotism, and by what we do to advance and develop every department of this Government, and, if possible, to make it grander among the nations of the earth than it is to-day. It is my desire, and I think it ought to be the aim of this House, that when this Congress adjourns we shall be able to say to the people that the country at large is better because of our services here.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Speaker, I regret that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] did not find the time to answer the direct question which I put to him, which was as to whether, as an independent proposition, he was in favor of further increasing the power of the Committee on Appropriations in this House. As to being opposed to what gentlemen suggest, of opposing reduction of large salaries, I may say to gentlemen that although we might not declaim so much on this side of the House in regard to that matter as they do, wherever the salaries or other expenditures shall be shown to be too large this side of the House will be found as ready to reduce them as they will.

But it is because, Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to further increasing the power of these two or three committees of this House that I am opposed to the rule reported. What I desire to call the attention of the gentleman here to, and especially the gentlemen representing Western constituencies, is the power of two or three committees of this House. Take, if you please, the Committee on Rules, composed of five gentlemen, three of whom govern that committee. Take a map of the United States and go to the Southeastern portion of it, and there draw a triangle. Place the residence of the Speaker at one angle, place the residence of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] at another of the angles, and that of the distinguished gentleman in charge of this bill at the other point of the triangle, and then compare the space inclosed in the triangle with the vast remainder of the country upon your map. I have nothing to say against these gentlemen personally. They are all fair men, but what I desire to call attention to is that three men, living in the Southeastern portion of this country, absolutely control legislation under the action of the rules which we adopt.

I have taken some little trouble, Mr. Speaker, to see how historically this Committee on Rules has been composed. Go back as far as the Forty-sixth Congress—and mark you, gentlemen from the West, during all this time on this Committee on Rules we have only had one man from west of the Mississippi, and that was the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] [laughter], with the exception that in the Forty-sixth Congress, when Mr. Morrison of Illinois was a member of that committee. To-day we have in the distinguished gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS], who is a member of that committee, a gentleman from a State farther west than we have ever had. I want to appeal to gentlemen from the Atlantic States, from the New England States, from the empire States of Pennsylvania and New York, the great Middle States, the great Western States, the Southwestern or Middle Western, and the Northwestern, and likewise the States on the Pacific coast, to see whether you believe that your constituency is likely to secure fair treatment when legislation is controlled by such a committee?

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. PICKLER. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from South Dakota yield to the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. PICKLER. Not if it is to come out of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It will come out of the gentleman's time.

Mr. PICKLER. Then I do not care to yield.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from South Dakota declines to yield.

Mr. BUTLER. Oh, we will give him more time if he desires it.

Mr. PICKLER. All right; I will answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. BUTLER. I want to ask the gentleman in what country these portions are that he spoke of?

Mr. PICKLER. What portions?

Mr. BUTLER. This Southeast, Western, Southwestern, Middle Western, and the like?

Mr. PICKLER. I do not want to teach the gentleman geography. It has been very evident already that he ought to receive some instruction in that line. [Laughter.]

Mr. BUTLER. I supposed that we were in America; but I did not know what the gentleman meant.

Mr. PICKLER. My point, gentlemen, and I ask the attention of the gentlemen from the West to it, is to call attention to the narrowing of the power to two or three committees of this House. Here comes the Committee on Appropriations—and every chairman of every committee of this House is fighting for more power. So we see the distinguished gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] now coming up, and by this proposition desiring to have more power delegated to the Committee on Appropriations.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BUCHANAN of New Jersey. I hope the gentleman's time will be extended.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. BUCHANAN of New Jersey. Give him five minutes more.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I trust that the gentleman will be allowed to get through with his remarks.

Several MEMBERS. Give him more time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House will be in order, and perhaps the Chair can hear what the gentleman from Mississippi is saying, but he can not with a dozen members talking at the same time.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I withdraw the motion to adjourn, but will renew it as soon as the gentleman finishes his remarks.

Mr. PEEL. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from South Dakota be allowed five minutes more.

There was no objection.

Mr. PICKLER. I was simply desiring to call attention for a moment to the enormous power that the Committee on Appropriations now has in this House. The distinguished gentleman from Indiana, as easily as he could will it, could increase or decrease the amount of the appropriation bills of this House $50,000,000. There is no question about that.

The distinguished gentleman from Indiana, as a member of a committee on conference, could, by holding off in the conference on an appropriation bill, add five millions, or decrease a bill to the extent of $5,000,000, just as he wills. And so, gentlemen, I am opposed to such great power that gentleman can see has been vested in two or three committees in this House. I am opposed to further concentration of power in the hands of two or three committees.

The country, Mr. Speaker, is weary with the concentration of power and wealth in corporations and trusts in this country. There is no question about which there has been so much discussion in this country in the last few years; and, sir, in the Fifty-first Congress, swift as we were to pass the antitrust bill, we only voiced the sentiments of the country.

Shall it be said, sir, with this feeling of the American people against this concentration of wealth and power in the trusts and monopolies—shall it be said that the American Congress places in the hands of two or three committees greater power, greater concentration of the great forces that move this Government, than has ever been obtained by any corporation or trust in the land? I do not pretend to offer a remedy, but it does seem to me that the time has come when you gentleman who have had large experience in this House should, not as partisans, but as statesmen, take up this question and devise some means of distributing this power. I tell you now that the Committee on Rules, at least, ought to be composed of fifteen members. As to the membership of the Committee on Rules, we had had only one man from west of the Mississippi on that committee, the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS], and that, with the exception of Mr. Morrison of Illinois, who was a member of the committee in the Forty-sixth Congress, the distinguished gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS], who is now a member, came from a State farther west than any that had ever been represented upon that committee.

INTRODUCTION OF BILLS.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, pending the motion to adjourn, I ask unanimous consent to introduce two bills for my colleague, Mr. HEARD, who is absent on account of sickness.

There was no objection.

The bills were introduced, read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and referred as follows:

EAST WASHINGTON AND CROSSTOWN RAILROAD.

By Mr. HEARD: A bill (H. R. 5353) to incorporate the East Washington and Crosstown Railway Company of the District of Columbia—to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE OSAGE.

By Mr. CHARLES W. STONE: Petition of the Presbyterian Church, Coraopolis, Pa., asking that the World's Fair be closed on the Sabbath and to prevent the sale of liquors on the grounds and of impure art exhibitions—to the Select Committee on the Columbian Exposition.

By Mr. STOUT: Petition of citizens of Michigan, against the Sunday opening of the Columbian Exposition—to the Select Committee on the Columbian Exposition.

By Mr. TERRY: Petition of certain citizens of Little Rock, Ark., for improvement of Arkansas River—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

By Mr. TURNER: Petition of 44 citizens of Bainbridge, Ga., for the "deep-water project" of the Savannah River—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

By Mr. WAUGH: Petition of citizens of Boone County, Ind., for the passage of what is known as the Butterworth or option bill—to the Committee on Agriculture.

Also, petition of citizens of Boone County, Ind., for the passage of a bill imposing a revenue tax upon compound lard—to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. WILLIAMS of Massachusetts: Petition of Daniel W. Hyd, of Boston, Mass., praying for the enactment of a law authorizing the use exclusively in the customs service on and after July 1, 1893, of the metric system of weights and measures—to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

By Mr. WRIGHT: Papers and proof of Mary Ann Lafferty in pension claim—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, papers and proof in the pension claim of Sarah J. Mallory—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, February 3, 1892.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

REPORT OF NATIONAL ACADEMY OF SCIENCES.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the annual report of the National Academy of Sciences. The letter of transmittal by the president will be read.

The letter was read, as follows:

NATIONAL ACADEMY OF SCIENCES,
Washington, D. C., January 25, 1892.

SIR: In conformity with the requirements of the act of incorporation, approved March 3, 1863, I have the honor to submit herewith a report of the operations of the National Academy of Sciences during the past year.

Very respectfully,

O. C. MARSH,
President of the National Academy of Sciences.

The PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The attention of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] is requested. What disposition shall be made of the accompanying documents?

Mr. HAWLEY. I offer a concurrent resolution for printing the usual number, and I ask that the whole be referred to the Committee on Printing. I send to the desk the resolution, which is required to be referred under the rule.

The concurrent resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed, in addition to the usual number, 3,500 copies of the annual report of the National Academy of Sciences for 1891, in octavo form, of which 1,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate, 2,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 500 copies for the use of the National Academy of Sciences; and that there be printed, in addition to the usual number, 2,300 copies, in quarto form, of the Memoirs of the National Academy of Sciences, which accompany the annual report for 1891, of which 300 copies shall be for the use of the Senate, 500 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 1,500 copies for the use of the National Academy of Sciences.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution, with the letter of transmittal and accompanying documents, will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT presented a petition of citizens of Winnebago County, Iowa, praying for the passage of the so-called option bill; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of the Robert T. Lincoln Club, of Brooklyn, N. Y., reciting certain facts with reference to the recent Chilean incident, expressing its approval of the negotiations surrounding the same, and praying Congress to uphold the President in the position he has taken in the matter; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented memorials of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church of Columbia, Tenn., remonstrating against a loan being made to the Chicago Fair, especially if it is to be open on the Sabbath; which were referred to the Committee on the Quadro-Centennial (Select).

He also presented a petition of the Federation of Labor of the District of Columbia, praying for the passage of a bill directing the investigation of the "slums" of large cities, etc.; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. SANDERS. I present a memorial adopted at a convention of delegates from the States of California, Colorado, Idaho, Kansas, Montana, Nebraska, Nevada, Oregon, Texas, and Wyoming, and the Territories of Utah and New Mexico, to consider matters appertaining to the arid lands of the West. This was a representative convention, composed of citizens who have given the subject large attention, and I move that the memorial be printed as a document and referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. QUAY presented a petition of 272 citizens of Adams County, Pa., praying for the closing on Sunday of any exposition or exhibition where appropriations of the United States are expended; which was referred to the Committee on the Quadro-Centennial (Select).

Mr. CAMERON presented the petition of Charles H. Cramp, president, William Cramp & Sons Company, and J. Shields Wilson, president of the Wilmington (Del.) Steamboat Company, and others, praying for the passage of the bill to transfer the Revenue Cutter Service to the naval establishment; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. MCMILLAN presented a petition of the American Eagle Tobacco Company and 8 other wholesale firms, of Detroit, Mich., praying for the passage of an amendment to section 26 of the tariff and tax act of 1890; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BLODGETT presented a petition of Haddon Grange, Patrons of Husbandry, of Camden County, N. J., praying for the passage of a bill defining options and futures and imposing special taxes upon dealers therein; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a memorial of the Baptist Church of Newton, N. J., and a memorial of the Christian Endeavor Society of Newton, N. J., remonstrating against the passage of a bill permitting the opening of any exhibition or exposition on Sunday; which were referred to the Committee on the Quadro-Centennial (Select).

Mr. VILAS presented a petition of the Congregational Young People's Society of Fond du Lac, Wis., praying that no exposition or exhibition for which appropriation is made by Congress shall be opened on Sunday; which was referred to the Committee on the Quadro-Centennial (Select).

Mr. BATE presented a petition of citizens of Hayward County, Tenn., praying for the passage of what is commonly known as the option bill; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. COKE presented the petition of Glenn W. Cooper, attorney for Mary A. Rose and other citizens of Victoria, Tex., praying to be allowed compensation for property taken by the United States Army; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. VEST presented the petition of Hon. Benjamin Butterworth, secretary of the World's Fair, and 102 prominent citizens of Chicago, Ill., praying that the Secretary of War be authorized to contract with Charles Stoughton for the completion of the Harlem River improvement and for the construction of the Harlem Kills Canal; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. FRYE presented a petition of vessel owners and other citizens of Portland, Me., praying for the transfer of the Revenue Cutter Service to the Navy Department; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. COCKRELL presented a petition of the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union, signed by 94 citizens of Kingsville, Mo., praying that no exposition or exhibition for which appropriations are made by Congress shall be opened on Sunday; which was referred to the Committee on the Quadro-Centennial (Select).

Mr. PERKINS presented a petition of the Board of Trade of Topeka, Kans., praying for the passage of the Torrey bankruptcy bill; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. PLATT presented a memorial of 170 citizens of Newington, Conn., members of the Congregational Church, remonstrating against the opening on Sunday of any exhibition or exposition where United States money is expended; which was referred to the Committee on the Quadro-Centennial (Select).

Mr. DAWES presented a memorial of the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union, of Bernardston, Mass., and other associated organizations, remonstrating against any exposition or exhibition for which appropriations are made by Congress being opened on Sunday; which was referred to the Committee on the Quadro-Centennial (Select).

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am directed by the Committee on Foreign Relations to report an amendment to the first deficiency bill, proposing to appropriate $5,000 to enable the Government of the United States to be properly represented at the International Art Exhibition to be held at Munich, in the Kingdom of Bavaria, from June 1 to October 31, 1892. I move that the communication from the Secretary of State and accompanying documents be printed, and, with the amendment, referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DOLPH. By direction of the Committee on Foreign Relations I report back favorably, with amendments, Senate bill 540, introduced by myself, for the purpose of continuing in force all existing laws prohibiting and regulating the coming into this country of Chinese persons and persons of Chinese descent for a period of ten years. I call the attention of my colleague [Mr. MITCHELL], the Senator from California [Mr. FELTON], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART], and the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] to the fact that I report back adversely the bills upon the same subject introduced by them, the bill now reported favorably being intended by the committee to take the place of those bills, and its provisions being supposed to be sufficient.

I give notice that after the bill has been printed as proposed to be amended and parties interested have had an opportunity to examine it, I shall at the earliest practicable date call the bill up for action by the Senate, as the existing laws all expire by limitation in May next, and I desire that some attention shall be given to the matter and the laws extended for a limited period before the present acts on the subject expire.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The title of the bill will be stated and it will be placed on the Calendar.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. 540) to continue in force an act entitled "An act to execute certain treaty stipulations relating to Chinese," approved May 6, 1882; an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to execute certain treaty stipulations relating to Chinese,' approved May 6, 1882," approved July 5, 1884, and an act entitled "An act a supplement to an act entitled 'An act to execute certain treaty stipulations relating to Chinese,' approved the 6th day of May, 1882," approved October 1, 1888.

The bills adversely reported by Mr. DOLPH were postponed indefinitely, as follows:

A bill (S. 65) supplemental to an act entitled "An act supplemental to an act entitled 'An act to execute certain treaty stipulations relating to Chinese,' approved May 6, 1882," approved October 1, 1888 (by Mr. STEWART);

A bill (S. 84) to suspend the coming of Chinese laborers to the United States, and for other purposes (by Mr. CULLOM);

A bill (S. 630) to amend an act entitled "An act a supplement to an act entitled 'An act to execute certain treaty stipulations relating to Chinese,' approved May 6, 1882," approved October 1, 1888 (by Mr. FELTON); and

A bill (S. 719) to absolutely prohibit the coming of Chinese persons into the United States, whether subjects of the Chinese Empire or otherwise (by Mr. MITCHELL).

Mr. PASCO, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 798) for the relief of the legal representatives of John H. Jones and Thomas D. Harris, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. STEWART, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 18) for the relief of Edward S. Armstrong, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. MITCHELL, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 262) for the relief of Jabez Burchard, asked to be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs; which was agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am directed by the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 177) for the relief of Hattie E. Winn, of West Carroll Parish, La., to report it adversely and recommend that it be indefinitely postponed. On examination we find that the claimants in this case have been paid the full amount of the claim in the bill.

The bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. MITCHELL. By direction of the Committee on Claims I report adversely the bill (S. 185) for the relief of Fanny B. Randolph and Dora L. Stark, of Avoyelles Parish, State of Louisiana, for stores and supplies taken by the military forces of the United States, and recommend its indefinite postponement.

I am further instructed, however, in the same case to report a resolution, accompanied by a written report, recommending that the case be referred to the Court of Claims.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill being adversely reported will be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. MITCHELL. I ask that the resolution may be read and placed on the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The resolution was read and ordered to be placed on the Calendar as follows:

Resolved, That the claim of Fanny B. Randolph and Dora L. Stark for stores and supplies taken by the military forces of the United States for their use during the war for the suppression of the rebellion be, and the same is hereby, referred, with all the papers in the case, to the Court of Claims under the provisions of the act of March 3, 1883, commonly known as the "Bowman act," as amended by the act of March 3, 1887, commonly known as the "Tucker act."

Mr. PETTIGREW, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 695) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to survey and mark the boundary between the State of Nebraska and that portion of the State of South Dakota which is embraced in the Pine Ridge and Rosebud Indian Reservations, reported it with amendments.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. COKE introduced a bill (S. 2030) for the relief of James Calvin Lipscomb; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BLACKBURN introduced a bill (S. 2031) for the benefit of Richard H. Taylor; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also (by request) introduced a bill (S. 2032) to repeal the provisions of the act of Congress approved the 3d of March, 1891, entitled "An act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1891, and for prior years, and for other purposes," which provides for the forfeiture of the charter and the other rights of the Metropolitan Railroad Company of Washington, D. C.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. DAWES (by request) introduced a bill (S. 2033) for the relief of the freedmen in the Chickasaw Nation, Indian Territory; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying petition, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2034) to provide for the care of dependent children in the District of Columbia, and to create a board of children's guardians; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. VANCE introduced a bill (S. 2035) to refund to property-holders on Pennsylvania avenue, between First and Fifteenth streets west, two-thirds of the assessment levied and paid under the act of Congress of July 8, 1870; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2036) for the relief of the heirs of R. D. Hay; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. GALLINGER introduced a bill (S. 2037) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Keene, in the State of New Hampshire; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. SAWYER introduced a bill (S. 2038) construing the act of February 28, 1877, increasing the pensions in certain cases; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2039) granting a pension to Catharine W. Tennis; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2040) granting an increase of pension to Fletcher S. Kidd; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SHERMAN introduced a bill (S. 2041) for the relief of W. H. Davis, first lieutenant, late Company H, Twenty-fifth Regiment Ohio Infantry Volunteers; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. QUAY introduced a bill (S. 2042) granting an increase of pension to Mrs. Helen G. Heiner; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BUTLER introduced a bill (S. 2043) for the relief of Carrie O. Wallace; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MITCHELL introduced a bill (S. 2044) extending the privilege of bounty land to persons who served in the Indian wars of the United States subsequent to March 3, 1855; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. MITCHELL. I ask that the bill may be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. DOLPH. I suggest to my colleague that I do not think the Committee on Public Lands has ever taken jurisdiction of that subject. The proper reference of the bill, I think, would be to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MITCHELL. I had some little question myself about that, and I am not quite certain to which committee it should be referred.

Mr. DOLPH. I should like to hear the title again read.

The Secretary read the title of the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. That should go to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MITCHELL. Then I ask that the bill may be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is informed that similar bills have usually gone to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MITCHELL. Very well. Then I ask that the bill be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That order will be made.

Mr. McMILLAN introduced a bill (S. 2045) to provide for the rebuilding of the bridge across Rock Creek at M street northwest, in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. CAMERON introduced a bill (S. 2046) to amend section 1417 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, in relation to the number of enlisted men in the Navy; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. VOORHEES introduced a bill (S. 2047) for the relief of the heirs and legal representatives of Bayless W. Hanna, deceased, late envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to the Argentine Republic; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MANDERSON (by request) introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 38) authorizing the publication of a history and digest of the international arbitrations to which the United States was a party; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Printing.

CLAIM OF ESTATE OF PRESTON ROSE.

Mr. COKE submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Claims:

Resolved, That the claim of Mary A. Rose (widow), Kate Rose, Bettie Rose, Linda Rose, Wirt Rose, Frank Rose, and Eric Rose, children of Preston Rose, who died in 1860, testate, leaving his property to his widow and children, all of the State of Texas, said claim being for quartermaster and commissary stores and supplies, and other property alleged to have been taken and used by the United States Army during the late war from the plantation of said widow and children, at or near Victoria, in the county of Victoria and State of Texas, be referred to the Secretary of War, who shall investigate the justice and equity of said claim, and the loyalty of the claimants, and report the amount and value of the property taken and used by the said Army, and also what amount, if any, has been paid on the same, and that he report all the facts and evidence in the case for the further consideration of the Senate.

INDIAN SCHOOLS.

Mr. DAWES submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to communicate to the Senate a copy of the report made by the Hampton Institute in response to the resolution of the Senate passed February 28, 1891.

PURCHASE OF MONROE PAPERS.

Mr. CHANDLER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be requested to transmit to the Senate any information which may be within his possession concerning any existing unpublished correspondence and manuscripts of President James Monroe, with the opinion of the Secretary as to the expediency of the purchase of the same by the Government.

PROHIBITION IN ALASKA.

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President, a few days since I had occasion to make some remarks in regard to an article which I quoted from The Voice. I have since received a letter from Hon. John H. Keatley, of Sioux City, Iowa, who was at one time United States district judge of Alaska, which is full of information as to the condition of affairs there, an important subject, I think, for the consideration of the Senate, and in which he concurs in my views of the situation, and thinks that the license system there would accomplish something, whereas nothing is accomplished under existing law. I ask to make this letter a part of my present remarks that it may have full circulation and be seen by all Senators.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The letter will be printed in the RECORD as part of the Senator's remarks, if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

The letter is as follows:

SIOUX CITY, IOWA, January 30, 1892.

DEAR SIR: I have just carefully read your remarks in the Senate on the 26th instant, as published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the 27th instant, in reference to the regulation of the liquor traffic in Alaska.

As I was appointed United States judge of that district July 12, 1888, took the oath of office at Sitka August 25, 1888, and served until December, 8, 1889, when my voluntary resignation took effect, and I was relieved by my successor. I perhaps know something about the troubles and difficulties in enforcing the prohibitory clause of the act of Congress approved May 14, 1884.

I was at Sitka when Collector Pracht, appointed by the present Administration, reached that place and assumed the duties of his appointment. As I understood it at the time, Mr. Pracht had had a conference with Mr. Windom, Secretary of the Treasury, before he left Washington for Alaska, and the Secretary expressed a strong desire that the regulations of the Department relating to the issuing of permits to introduce intoxicating liquors should be rigidly enforced.

Complaint had been made before that that Mr. Pracht's predecessor had been too liberal and indulgent in that respect, and a radical change was desired upon the part of the existing Administration. The consequence was that the collector practically denied all applications both at Sitka and through his deputies at other points. Not only that, whenever goods of that character were surreptitiously gotten ashore for saloon purposes, Mr. Pracht made vigilant search for the smuggled goods, and made seizures of the same, and condemnations quickly followed. I remember distinctly one instance where about $500 worth of liquors (smuggled) were found in the loft of a saloon at Sitka, and were properly libeled, and upon a full hearing were condemned and ordered sold, under a decree which I made, as among the last of my official acts in Alaska. Watchmen of the utmost fidelity were placed by the collector in and about every mail steamer coming to Sitka, and during its stay of twenty-four hours, but owing to the fact that the natives (Indians) in their canoes came about the ship to barter with curios, etc., contraband liquors almost invariably found their way ashore, through the activity of seamen and roustabouts belonging to the steamers.

Under Governor Swineford, when I reached Alaska, in August, 1888, a system of saloon licensing was in practice. No case was ever made making it necessary for me to judicially pass upon the validity of that system of getting some revenue for the building of sidewalks at Sitka, which was the pretext, and the method of its expenditure, but in an informal and unofficial way, I expressed my opinion of the invalidity of the entire proceeding.

From the time of the arrival of Governor Knapp, in May, I think, 1889, until my departure early in December of the same year, I always understood that that system of issuing licenses had been abandoned.

As to the enforcing of the provisions of the act of May 14, 1884, and the general statutes of the United States, and the statutes of the State of Oregon, prohibiting both the sale, or gift of intoxicating liquors to Indians, I made some observations. During the period of my official career no prosecutions were commenced, except in one or two minor instances, during November, 1888, to enforce the criminal provisions of the act of May 14, 1884, and those cases in that respect that I now recall in memory, were where several Indians, in two instances, one at Killisnoo, were detected in landing a bottle of whisky from the mail steamer.

Public sentiment in the Territory was strongly against either the sale or gift of intoxicating liquors to natives (Indians), and prosecutions before commissioners and in the district court were very frequent, and in few cases did the accused escape conviction and sentence. I do not now remember a single instance where a recognized saloon-keeper, at any of the towns and canning stations, were accused of this offense, except at Chilcat, or Pyramid Harbor, where there were no white people but the few in charge of the cannery. The most numerous violations were by individuals who are called, in the States, "boot-leggers."

The fact is that the recognized saloon-keepers (white men) were as persistent in enforcing the law against either selling or giving liquors to Indians as those who had no direct interest in the liquor business whatever.

To one who has lived on the frontier, and in contact with the Indian tribes and villages, the reason of that desire to prosecute and punish in such instances, is obvious. It is simply to guard against a danger common to all, saloon-keeper and ordinary citizen, from such indiscriminate sale of this perilous element in frontier society.

I do not hesitate to say that owing to the most peculiar topographical and geographical features of Alaska, with its numerous mountainous islands, its rugged and forbidding mainland, its infinite number of narrow straits and sounds, timbered to the very edge of the water, and with the whole of Southeastern Alaska, island and mainland, covered with a dense underbrush for hundreds of miles of coast line, and with every facility for smuggling and hiding, furnished by the bay trading posts in Northern British Columbia, it is practically impossible to arrest the illegal introduction of intoxicating liquors into our Alaska territory. If public sentiment were practically unanimous in favor of enforcing the law, which it is not by any means, there is no remedy, under existing conditions, in a prohibitory law, such as the act of May 14, 1884. A coast-guard of 5,000 men loyally attempting to do their whole duty could make it little better than it is now.

I believe far greater and more satisfactory results can be reached by an authorized license system, and this, in my opinion, would enlist every individual paying the license fee in the effort to rigidly enforce such a license system.

I shall be glad if you will see Senator JONES of Arkansas, who knows me well, and he will give you an idea of my general character.

Yours, respectfully,

JNO. H. KEATLEY.

Hon. J. N. DOLPH,
Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.

BUREAU OF AMERICAN REPUBLICS BULLETINS.

Mr. MANDERSON submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring therein), That there be printed 15,000 copies of the bulletins of the Bureau of American Republics submitted to Congress by the President in connection with the first annual report of that Bureau, of which number 4,000 shall be for the use of members of the Senate, 8,000 for the use of the Members and Delegates of the House of Representatives, and 3,000 for distribution under the direction of the Secretary of State.

MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE.

Mr. KYLE. In pursuance of the notice given by me last Monday, I wish to call up the joint resolution (S. R. 29) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States relating to marriage and divorce. I ask that the joint resolution be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following article be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by three-fourths of said Legislatures, shall be valid as a part of the Constitution, namely:

"ARTICLE XVI.

"The Congress shall have exclusive power to regulate marriage and divorce in the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia."

Mr. KYLE. Mr. President, it is with deference to long-established custom that I rise to address this honorable body. But my interest in the resolution under consideration, supported by the concern of a large body of our best citizenship for the perpetuity of the family, may answer for what appears to be an innovation.

How far it may be a custom in Congress to give attention to questions of this nature, and to what extent there may now be a willingness to consider a resolution of such importance, I know not.

But it is my belief, Mr. President, that we can well afford to turn from questions, such as claims and public buildings, to a subject which is eminently fitting to command the attention of our country's wisest and best minds. This is a proposition for an amendment to our national Constitution. In this there is nothing new or strange.

Since the framing of the Constitution fifteen amendments have been offered and adopted. But I venture the assertion that, as compared with those preceding, the proposed amendment stands preëminent as being of vital interest to the life of our Republic. Of the fifteen preceding amendments, ten were proposed by the First Congress in 1789, the eleventh in 1794, and the twelfth in 1803.

Many of these relate to the rights of citizens, and are, so to speak, the finishings of the Constitution. The last three adopted since 1865, relating to or growing out of the war, present the first real amendatory ideas not foreseen by the fathers of the Constitution. They refer to slavery, citizenship, and the electoral right, and are therefore of great moment. But the first institution given to mankind is greater than all questions touching subsequent rights between man and man. If the sacredness which has attached to marriage in the past is to be eliminated, the family is in peril, and the associate institutions of society rest upon insecure foundations.

It is not my purpose to-day to examine the moral side of the question, though I firmly believe in marriage as a moral institution. But from a secular standpoint and in the light of a civil contract, it is of vital interest to us that the sacredness of it be held inviolate. We have arrived at a period in the history of nations when problems of sociology supersede all others. Wars for conquest are practically ended. Governments are well defined and established. The eyes of nations are now turned from the external to the internal; from the objective to the subjective. Questions, such as crime in relation to society, confront us; temperance and society; the wage system and society; wealth and poverty in relation to society; education, charity, politics, and religion in the same relation. The basis of all sociological problems, however, is the family, and its preservation by proper laws regulating marriage and divorce. It is both moral and civil in its aspects; but being civil it is not divested of that which makes it a contract of a character different from others, and therefore demanding special legislative consideration. An eminent judge, Lord Bannatyne, says:

Though the origin of marriage is a contract, it is in a different situation from all others. It is a contract coeval with and essential to society, while the relations of husband and wife, parent and child, to which it gives rise, are the foundation of many rights acknowledged all the world over, and which, though differently modified in different countries, have everywhere a legal character altogether independent of the will of the parties. The rights arising from the relations of husband and wife, though taking their origin in contract, have yet in all countries a legal character determined by their particular laws and usages altogether independent of the terms of the contractor or the will of the parties at the time of entering into it.

Upon this point I quote, also, Lord Robertson, the distinguished Scottish judge. He says:

Marriage being entirely a personal, consensual contract, it may be thought that the lex loci must be resorted to in expounding every question that arises relating to it. But it will be observed that marriage is a contract sui generis, and differing in some respects from all other contracts; so that the rules of law which are applicable in expounding and enforcing other contracts may not apply to this. The contract of marriage is the most important of all human transactions. It is the very basis of the whole fabric of civilized society.

The status of marriage is juris gentium, and the foundation of it, like that of all other contracts, rests on the consent of the parties. But it differs from other contracts in this, that the rights, obligations, or duties arising from it are not left entirely to be regulated by the agreements of the parties, but are, to a certain extent, matters of municipal regulation, over which the parties have no control by any declaration of their will. It confers the status of legitimacy upon children born in wedlock, with all the consequential rights, duties, and privileges thence arising; it gives rise to the relations of consanguinity and affinity; in short, it pervades the whole system of civil society.

Unlike other contracts, it can not, in general amongst civilized nations, be dissolved by mutual consent, and it subsists in full force even though one of the parties should be forever rendered incapable (as in the case of incurable insanity, or the like) from performing his part of the mutual contract. No wonder that the rights, duties, and obligations arising from so important a contract should not be left to the discretion or caprice of the contracting parties, but should be regulated in many important particulars by the laws of every civilized country. And such laws must be considered as forming a very essential part of the public law of the country. As to the constitution of marriage, as it is merely a personal, consensual contract; it must be valid everywhere if celebrated according to the lex loci; but with regard to the rights, duties, and obligations thence arising, the law of the domicile must be looked to. It must be admitted that in every country the laws relating to divorce are considered of the utmost importance, as public laws affecting the dearest interest of society.

William E. Gladstone, in writing upon this subject, says:

The greatest of all human controversies is the marriage controversary.

Numerous such opinions of men eminent in the legal profession might be given, but these are sufficient to show that a sociological question of this nature is not left to the realm of mere moral sentiment. As a civil institution the legislative powers must throw around it safeguards and regulations. That the constitutional fathers did not incorporate the power to legislate upon marriage and divorce does not argue against the importance of doing so now.

Slavery existed then, but subsequent difficulties concerning it were not discussed; the thirteenth amendment was not even thought of. There were marriages and divorces in those days, but living in an age when much of sacredness attached to such relations, the evils of divorce and divorce legislation attracted little attention. Much less the possibility of conflict amongst a small number of States practically one in sentiment.

But now this question, of all others in sociology, takes the lead. Thoughtful men on both sides of the water are raising the alarm as they witness the decay of our best institution. We have enlarged our borders rapidly; territory from France, Mexico, and other governments has been added with inhabitants included. New England or the thirteen original States no longer hold the balance of moral power. English or church ideas no longer prevail; accessions come from other quarters where the secular overbalances the religious touching the question of marriage. All grades of definition, therefore, are framed, from the extreme ecclesiastic to the extreme secular. This accounts largely for our present anomalous situation and the threatening danger. Petitions for better legislation from associations, commissions, and churches have been presented in rapid succession during the past decade. They appear in the Legislatures of many of our States, asking for uniform laws.

Only within a few years have they ventured to disturb the National Congress, and then not to ask for legislation, but that Congress investigate and report the evils concerning marriage and divorce. These petitions came, during the winter of 1884, from States East and West, and representing governors, legislators, jurists, divines, and prominent educators. From the report of the Commissioner of Labor I quote the substance of these petitions:

That the wide differences between the laws of the several States as to the cause of divorce, and the jurisdiction of their courts over suits for divorce by or against nonresidents, constitute an acknowledged element of confusion and uncertainty in American jurisprudence. That these differences have led to many and distressing conflicts of judicial decisions in cases turning upon the degree of faith and credit to be given to decrees of divorce under the Constitution and laws of the United States or the comity of nations, so that a marriage is often treated, at the same time, in one State as dissolved, and in another State or country as subsisting; and a man may be convicted of bigamy or adultery in one jurisdiction upon what would be a lawful marriage in another.

That the ever-growing number of foreign immigrants who become American citizens, and thus subject marriages contracted abroad to the jurisdiction of our courts of divorce, or, by a temporary return to their original domicile, may submit American divorces to the test of examination by foreign tribunals, make these matters a not infrequent cause of collision in the administration of private international law; that the magnitude of these evils, their bearing upon our general social conditions, and the best methods of guarding against their increase, can be fully apprehended only by a careful collection of the facts and statistics of divorce; and that no attempt to obtain such statistics can hope for any considerable success, unless it is made by the authority of the United States. Your memorialists therefore pray that such a law may be passed as will provide for a thorough inquiry into the various matters above referred to, and the collection of statistics of divorce from the records and authorities of the several States as a basis for future legislation.

It is gratifying, Mr. President, to learn from the records that members of Congress were sensibly affected by such memorials. The Judiciary Committee of the Senate and House, acknowledging the importance of the question, introduced a bill in 1884 providing for the collection of these statistics. Through the efforts of the distinguished Senator from Vermont and others an appropriation was made in 1887 and the responsibility of collecting such information placed in the hands of the Commissioner of Labor.

The Commissioner's report, consisting of more than 1,000 pages, published in 1889, is exhaustive, covering a period from 1867 to 1886 from every State in the Union and from every civilized country.

The facts brought to light are such as to create alarm and to attract the thought of Congress to this question.

We have now forty-four States, with as many quite dissimilar statutes upon the subject of marriage and divorce; some in old States with well-tried morals, some in very new States with a heterogeneous population; some biblical and religious, some intensely secular and practical; some unwisely stringent, others too loose to stand the test of public sentiment, while, as President Woolsey says—

It is observable that the statutory laws of this country relating to this subject seem in general to have been drawn up by men who either did not possess much knowledge of the unwritten law which governs it, or did not regard such unwritten law worthy to be considered by them in framing the statute, and who, moreover, gave but little thought to the practical working of the statute.

This assertion is supported by multitudes of conflicts and variations—variations between different States as to definitions of marriage, qualifications for marriage, consanguinity, miscegenation; as to license, form of solemnization, age of consent, validity of marriage under certain conditions; as to remarriage of divorced parties, grounds of divorce and methods of securing the same, who shall grant divorce, validity of divorce under certain conditions, legitimacy of children, property rights, alimonies, penalties, etc.

Only eighteen States give a definition of marriage, and many of these differ. In thirteen States illegitimate children are legitimized by marriage of parents. Twenty-four States legitimize such children by marriage of parents and acknowledgment of the father. Penalty or prosecution for seduction is suspended by marriage in sixteen States. Capability of marrying ranges from 14 to 16 years of age on the part of males, and from 12 to 16 on the part of females.

Parental consent likewise varies. As to degrees of consanguinity permissible in marriage, only nineteen States have a likeness to the statutes of other States. The language in regard to void, voidable, or prohibited marriage is different in almost every State of the Union. As to solemnization, all shades of enactments are found. For instance, it is the law in Maryland, or was until lately, that no one but a clergyman could perform such ceremony, while in New York the court of appeals has decided—

That a man and a woman, without going before a minister, without the presence of any person as a witness, with no previous public notice given, with no form or ceremony, civil or religious, and with no record or written evidence of the fact, and merely by words of the present, may contract matrimony.

In other States, as in Illinois, what is termed a "common-law marriage" is valid—that is, two people making a mutual agreement to live together as husband and wife, without any ceremony being performed or public declaration made, may be considered legally married. The consequence is that in such States cases daily arise where after death some person appears claiming a husband's or wife's interest in an estate by reason of an alleged "common-law marriage." As can be easily seen, this system results in a vast amount of immorality, fraud, and attempts at blackmail.

A sort of omnibus law passed in Arizona in 1887 provides "that all persons who have prior to that date lived together as husband and wife and have continued to do so one year should be considered legally married." In some States, as in Illinois, Kentucky, and South Dakota, the marriage of cousins is made incestuous and void. If, however, persons within the prohibited relationship go to another State to be married the marriage is in most States held valid. Also the marriage in some States of minors without the consent of parents or guardians is prohibited, but the decisions are conflicting between the various States as to whether such marriages when celebrated are valid or as to whether they may afterwards be annulled upon the application of the parties or of their parents or guardians.

In some States certain forms of requisites, such as licenses and the appearance before a minister of the gospel or some public officer, are necessary for the celebration of a valid marriage; and in some instances, before a minister is authorized to celebrate a marriage he must file certificates in some public office. In very many cases this is neglected, and the result is that innocent persons celebrating a marriage before a minister whom they have every reason to suppose is qualified to officiate enter into a marriage contract the validity of which is, to say the least, very doubtful.

Under the present system of marriage laws, as adopted by the forty odd States and Territories, there is in most instances no proper record kept of the celebration of marriages, and this often leads to a vast amount of litigation and other annoyances. Applicants for pensions can, many of them, disclose the annoyances to which they are put by the fact of the loss of a marriage certificate and the consequent difficulty of proving a legal marriage to a sailor or soldier of the United States. The result is that many deserving widows of men who have faithfully served their country, and who are legally and morally entitled to assistance from our Government, are unable to obtain it, from the mere fact of the unsettled condition of the marriage and divorce laws of our country.

Thirteen States provide that marriages beyond their boundaries are valid if valid in the States where the marriage is solemnized. But in Mississippi, if parties prohibited by miscegenation go to another State and are married, the marriage is void if they return. Parties so prohibited by consanguinity or affinity or miscegenation in Delaware, who, though married in another State, shall live together as husband and wife, are guilty of a misdemeanor, and may be fined $100.

The Georgia statute reads:

All marriages solemnized in another State, by parties intending at the time to reside in this State, shall have the same legal consequences and effect as if solemnized in this State. Parties residing in this State can not evade any of the provisions of its laws as to marriage by going into another State for the solemnization of the marriage ceremony.

But, Mr. President, the anomalous character of our statutes relating to divorce is more apparent. They are so diverse and contradictory as to place in jeopardy our whole social fabric. From a prominent lawyer of my own State I quote the following:

The practical result of the conflict of laws in the various States is that divorce granted in one State may be valid in that State and invalid in other States. In South Carolina, for instance, the courts refuse to recognize a divorce granted by the courts of another State, even in cases where both of the parties to the marriage resided in the State granting the divorce at the time of the divorce suit, provided the marriage was solemnized in South Carolina. And in several reported cases, the courts of that State have held second marriages of persons so divorced invalid, and the children of such marriages illegitimate.

In New York the courts have held that while a divorce may be perfectly valid in the State where it was granted, and while a second marriage in such State may be valid in New York, that the divorce will not be recognized in New York.

The result is that under the decision of the New York court of appeals, and the other courts of that State, a man or woman may legally, have practically any number of husbands or wives, thus establishing a legalized system of polygamy in the largest State of the Union.

I understand there are cases on record in New York State of parties who are imprisoned for bigamy in consequence of violating this law.

In other States the courts have held a divorce valid granted to a person who was a citizen of another State by the State in which he held a citizenship, but holding invalid a divorce granted in a State where there was simply a residence and not an actual citizenship.

In some States the courts have held that the domicile of a wife is that of her husband, and that any divorce granted to the wife in another State, no matter how long she may have resided in such State, with the bona fide intention of remaining there, is invalid. In Illinois, in a case with which I am personally familiar, a citizen of the kingdom of Wurtemberg came to Illinois, married and resided there for some thirty years. He accumulated considerable property and returned to Wurtemberg, leaving his wife in Illinois. As he always remained a subject of the King of Wurtemberg, he obtained a divorce or order and decree in that kingdom nullifying the Illinois marriage upon the ground that under an old law of Wurtemberg, no subject of that country could marry without the consent of the King, in a foreign country. He afterwards remarried in Wurtemburg and subsequently died. The two widows contested for the property left by him, which amounted to several hundred thousand dollars, and the supreme court of Illinois decided in favor of the second wife, and held that the first marriage to the wife with whom he had lived over thirty years, and who had assisted him in accumulating his property, was invalid.

This decision was afterwards affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States.

In some States, for instance in New York, and also in South Dakota, when a divorce is granted upon the grounds of adultery, the guilty party is prohibited from remarrying. The courts, however, have held that if a person so divorced, in New York, for instance, steps over the line into New Jersey and is remarried there, the second marriage is valid, notwithstanding the prohibition imposed upon him by the New York laws.

In some States it is held that a person obtaining a divorce in a foreign State where personal service can not be obtained upon the defendant can legally remarry where the divorce is obtained and then return to his former place of residence and the second marriage will be held valid. If, however, he remarries in the State of which his former wife is a resident at the time of the divorce proceedings he is liable to be indicted and convicted of adultery or bigamy.

The foregoing, Mr. President, are but a few of the almost numberless cases of conflict in statutes. Pages could be filled from works like Storey on Conflict of Laws, Bishop on Marriage and Divorce, President Woolsey's notable work on Divorce and Divorce Legislation, from Commissioner Wright's report, and from the passing literature of the day. The demand is for national action upon this question. In my judgment this is justified upon the following grounds:

First. The people of this country of all professions and classes want a uniform law. Organizations and associations have been referred to. Great credit is due to the Rev. Dr. Dike, of Auburndale, Mass., for his indefatigable efforts along this line. Through the labors of his society State commissions have been appointed whose object was to work directly with State Legislatures. They have succeeded fairly well in ten years of service. But to me the task appears endless and hopeless. Forty-four State Legislatures must be brought into harmony in thought and legislation. This, considering our heterogeneous population, is next to an impossibility. But more discouraging still is the probability of these State laws being changed after being once wheeled into line.

Second. Our numerous, varied, and conflicting laws would be reduced to one simple, clear, uniform statute, applicable to all States and Territories. We now have our shelves so weighted down with lumbering volumes that it would puzzle the time-honored Philadelphia lawyer to keep pace with State enactments. A uniform law would be a benediction to both bar and bench. In fact, the effort for national uniformity has the indorsement of the National Bar Association. I have spoken at length of these conflicts. Congressional action would end our series of sensational disgraces, would prevent the stigma of illegitimacy being thrust upon thousands of innocent children, and would wind up the endless litigations as to property rights.

Third. International difficulties as to family relations and property rights would largely be settled. Marriages are contracted very frequently now between women of our country and citizens of foreign nations and vice versa. It is of vital moment that possible difficulties be removed.

Fourth. National law crystallizes the general and average sentiment of the country at large and not the local sentiment of a State. Many of our States have a large influx of foreign population from one nation or another. The result is that many distinct laws in regard to marriage and divorce, some loose, some stringent, prevail. Many of these are very repugnant to the American sentiment. Just now we again hear the knocking of Utah at our doors. She stands equipped with her arguments for statehood—enterprising citizens, great wealth and resources, large population. But within one week has come to me a remonstrance from citizens there who have lived amongst the Mormons for fifty years. The fear is that once admitted she might enact laws upon the marriage question inimical to the best sentiment of our people. With a national law the anxiety would end.

Fifth. The now too frequent, disgraceful episodes of contracting parties seeking some Gretna Green and of parties seeking divorce would be a thing of the past. Farcical trials and court judgments would seldom be known.

Sixth. A national law would embody the best features of our best State laws and would eliminate all that is undesirable.

Seventh. A national law would secure to us the stability of the marriage relation, preserve the family and the home, and thus lay a broad foundation for the perpetuity of the nation.

In conclusion, Mr. President, let me say that I speak not my own views alone upon this matter. Within two weeks my table has been covered with letters and papers from eminent lawyers and educators and representatives of the secular and religious press, urging this resolution as the rational solution of the divorce problem. My own State supports it; and to the honor of South Dakota, Mr. President, I wish to say that though we have secured a somewhat unenviable reputation in relation to divorce matters, we have a class of citizens who can not be surpassed for intelligence and morality. Our laws upon divorce are not more lax than those of numerous other States in the East as well as in the West. The grounds for divorce are similar to those of many other States. The privilege of instituting divorce proceedings, however, upon a ninety days' residence has brought us applicants from many States, and in consequence of fraud and perjury as to bona fide residence divorce proceedings are often corrupt and farcical.

It is safe to say that the laws of more than one-half of the States upon this question are a travesty upon wise legislation and reflect little credit upon a nation of advanced ideas. The Commissioner's report brings the magnitude of this evil clearly before the eye, as well as the possible danger which threatens us.

Divorces are increasing instead of falling off. One out of every 20 marriages in the United States results in a divorce. In Idaho, 1 in 10; in Maine, Rhode Island, and Vermont, 1 in 8; in Nevada and Wyoming, 1 in 6. During the period covered by the report there was an increase of 69 per cent in population, while divorces increased 157 per cent.

Considering our varied, conflicting, inadequate, and often disgraceful laws, together with the possibility that uniform legislation can not otherwise be secured, there is, Mr. President, practically no valid reason why the subject of marriage and divorce should not be relegated to the control of Congress. A wise statute could then be framed, so that parties married in one State would be married in every State, parties divorced in one State would be divorced in every State. Children would be protected in their heritage, the family would be preserved, society purified, and the state perpetuated.

Mr. President, I ask that the joint resolution be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be so referred in the absence of objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. O. TOWLES, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 2785) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend the general incorporation law of the District of Columbia," approved May 17, 1882.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

A bill (S. 1762) for the relief of the University of the State of Missouri;

A bill (H. R. 2785) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend the general incorporation law of the District of Columbia," approved May 17, 1882; and

A bill (H. R. 3931) to detach Montgomery County from the western and add it to the eastern district of Arkansas.

SENATOR FROM FLORIDA.

Mr. TURPIE. I wish to take from the Calendar the resolution reported from the Committee on Privileges and Elections on the subject of contested seats from Florida, for the purpose of having action upon it. I ask for its present consideration. I believe it is a privileged question.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the following resolution reported from the Committee on Privileges and Elections January 25, 1892, as follows:

Resolved, That the Hon. Wilkinson Call, of Florida, was duly elected by the Legislature of said State on the 26th day of May, 1891, a Senator of the United States from said State for the term of six years, commencing on the 4th day of March, 1891, and that he is lawfully entitled to a seat in the Senate.

Mr. TURPIE. Mr. President, that resolution was reported several days ago, together with a report in support of it. There is no dissent in the committee, nor as far as I know upon the floor of the Senate. The Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] indeed is occupying his seat. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], who first introduced this question, I notice is absent, but he has given his assent to the resolution both in committee and in the Senate. I therefore move the adoption of the resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. CHANDLER. I was not aware that this resolution was to be brought up at this time. If the Senator will allow it to go over until to-morrow I desire to submit a few suggestions upon the case.

Mr. TURPIE. It may go over until to-morrow.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be passed over.

UTAH JUDICIAL DISTRICTS.

Mr. WILSON. I request unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 187, being the bill (S. 1604) to provide for the creation of a fourth judicial district in the Territory of Utah.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. COCKRELL. Let us hear the bill read so that we may know what it is.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for information, subject to objection.

The bill was read; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider it.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REMOVAL OF REMAINS OF GEN. GRANT.

Mr. MANDERSON. I ask that Order number 3 of subjects on the table, being a resolution relative to the removal of the remains of Gen. Grant, be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered in the absence of objection.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT LOS ANGELES, CAL.

Mr. FELTON. I ask to take up for consideration Order of Business 51, being Senate bill 1215.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1215) for an extension of appropriation for the erection of a public building at Los Angeles, Cal.

Mr. COCKRELL. I think the Senator from California ought to be allowed to explain the bill. At least I want an explanation why this large increase in the appropriation should be made.

Mr. FELTON. Do I understand that the Senator desires an explanation?

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to hear an explanation of the necessity for the passage of the bill.

Mr. FELTON. In the Forty-ninth Congress an appropriation of $150,000 was made for a public building at Los Angeles, Cal. That was some years ago, when the town was a small one compared to what it is now. I will read from the report of the committee for the information of the Senator:

In the building contracted for no provision appears to have been made for a registry department, although 26,000 pieces were registered for Los Angeles post-office last year.

A United States district and circuit court for the southern district of California must be accommodated in a public building at Los Angeles; a United States land office; an internal-revenue office; a signal office; a customs office.

Twenty thousand feet of floor space is required for the transaction of public business in a public building at Los Angeles. The building contracted for provides for only about 8,000 feet of floor space.

The additional appropriation is recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury. I think there are Senators upon the floor who have visited that city, who have seen this building, and who are aware that its capacity is totally inadequate for the business which it is designed to take care of.

I have nothing further to say, as I do not desire to take up the time of the Senate unless further information is desired.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

F. F. WHITE.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The first bill on the Calendar will be stated.

The bill (S. 1030) for the relief of F. F. White was announced as first in order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill has been read at length, and is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. COCKRELL. There was an amendment, as I understood, to that bill proposed yesterday. I suggest that the Senator from Washington [Mr. ALLEN] is not here, nor the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH], who desire to offer amendments. I ask that the bill be passed over without prejudice, to be again called up.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over without prejudice.

NEW YORK, LAKE ERIE AND WESTERN RAILROAD COMPANY

The bill (S. 68) for the relief of the New York, Lake Erie and Western Railroad Company was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like some explanation of the bill; and I should like to know, particularly as this is for a railroad company and a successor to another, as to whether the first company with which the contract was made became insolvent and left creditors unpaid. That seems to be a very material question. I believe where an individual has gone into bankruptcy and some subsequent assignee is claiming something that is due to him, we do not often give it to him. If a railroad company went into bankruptcy and left creditors unpaid and here is a successor company coming in, I do not think it has any right to get any assets belonging to that defunct company in preference to the creditors.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. COCKRELL. There is no report with it. Let it go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

WEST VIRGINIA DIRECT TAX.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. R. 9) to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to the governor of the State of West Virginia the sum appropriated by the act of Congress entitled "An act to credit and pay to the several States and Territories and the District of Columbia all moneys collected under the direct tax levied by the act of Congress approved August 5, 1861."

The joint resolution was reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, in line 15, before the words "day of," to insert "25th," and, after the words "day of," to insert "August;" so as to make the joint resolution read:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to pay to the governor of the State of West Virginia, under the provisions, conditions, and limitations of the act of Congress entitled "An act to credit and pay to the several States and Territories and the District of Columbia all moneys collected under the direct tax levied by the act of Congress approved August 5, 1861," which act was approved March 2, 1891, the sum of $181,306.93, less the sum of $27,328.18, which was paid to the governor of the State of West Virginia on the 25th day of August, 1891, to be held in trust for the citizens and inhabitants of said State, notwithstanding any claim by the Government of the United States against the State of Virginia.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to ask why the necessity of inserting the last clause in that bill which reads "notwithstanding any claim by the Government of the United States against the State of Virginia." Is there any claim by the United States against the State of Virginia?

Mr. FAULKNER. It was suggested that there were bonds in the hands of the Secretary of the Interior, due by Virginia, issued prior to the separation of the State, held for the Indian trust fund. The Treasurer held that the Government had the right, under the statute, to offset the amount due to the State of West Virginia, and which was paid out of the treasury of the State of West Virginia under the direct tax law of 1861, and it should be credited upon the bonded indebtedness due by the State of Virginia to the United States Government.

The object of this joint resolution is to correct what the committee considered to be an error upon the part of the Department, as such action would require a settlement by the Department of the equities between the two States. The report upon which the resolution rests is the unanimous conclusion of the Committee on Claims, after a thorough examination of the question. I do not suppose there can be any possible objection to it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS FOR POST-OFFICES.

Mr. VEST. Order of Business 18, being Senate bill 427, was passed over without prejudice the other day. I ask that it may now be considered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The title of the bill will be reported.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 427) to provide for the erection of public buildings for post-offices in towns and cities where the post-office receipts for three years preceding have exceeded $3,000 annually.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. PLATT. Is there a report upon this bill?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is no report accompanying the bill.

Mr. PLATT. Has there been a report made at any previous time when the bill has been before the Senate?

Mr. VEST. Oh, yes. The bill was taken up and debated for the best part of a day. It was then thrust aside for some other bill, an appropriation bill, I think. It has been carefully considered, and it is the best bill that the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds can prepare. It is recommended by the Department, and if any criticism can be made upon it, we invite it.

Mr. PLATT. I should like to be informed as to approximately how many offices there are in the United States which have annual receipts of $3,000 and upward.

Mr. VEST. A statement is being prepared for me, but it has not come to me yet. There are some amendments to be made to it giving the exact number. I can only state approximately as I am informed by the Department.

Mr. PADDOCK. I am enabled to state, from a statement which I have received from the Post-Office Department, that taking the offices through whose receipts are $3,000 a year and not exceeding $5,000 they number 823 offices; the offices whose receipts are $5,000 and not exceeding $20,000, number 909 offices.

Mr. PLATT. What was the first?

Mr. PADDOCK. Where the gross receipts of the office were $3,000 and not exceeding $5,000.

Mr. PLATT. How many were they?

Mr. PADDOCK. Eight hundred and twenty-three. Where the gross receipts were $5,000 and not exceeding $20,000, the number was 909.

Mr. VEST. Still that does not cover the provision in this bill which requires that the gross receipts shall be $3,000 a year for the preceding three years, and that is the difficulty in the case. It requires a considerable amount of work in the Department in order to arrive exactly at the amount. The estimate made is about $6,000,000; that is to say, taking the offices under the provisions of this bill where the gross receipts have amounted to $3,000 a year for the three preceding years, it would involve an expenditure of about $6,000,000, which would be an immense saving to the country to do away with the—yes, I will use the word—scandal which now exists or is said to exist by the public press throughout the country, as to the profligate expenditures, as they are termed by the newspapers, for public buildings.

Mr. CHILTON. This bill limits the aggregate expenditure to $25,000 for a post-office building?

Mr. VEST. It can not exceed $25,000 in any town or city.

Mr. CHILTON. Would that protect the Government against special bills for these other appropriations which are coming in from time to time?

Mr. VEST. Not at all. It does not cover any except those cases mentioned in the bill. Our idea was to get rid of the abuse, for it is an abuse, of constructing in a town, for instance, where the gross receipts were not more than $3,000 a year for a series of years, a building worth $250,000 or $300,000 simply for a post-office. This bill covers only cases of post-offices. We have been passing public building bills here for $75,000, $100,000, and $150,000 for post-office edifices alone. The cases alluded to by the Senator from Texas are not touched by this bill. Take the largest cities, where the receipts are more than $3,000 a year, those are still within the discretion of Congress without limitation.

But as I understand the complaint, and it is a just one, and no one knows it is a just one better than myself, as to towns and cities where there is simply a post-office, no United States courts, no internal-revenue offices, no necessity except for postal purpose, the complaint is that in those towns and cities we have been expending largely too much money. Now, if we can adopt a system which would put a public building in those towns and cities where the gross receipts for three years have been $3,000 a year, it requires no argument to show the Senate what an improvement it will be upon the present scramble which we are engaged in here from year to year, and which has given rise to so much scandal.

I am instructed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to ask the attention of the Senate to this bill. The other day in the debate here this question was brought up in a very aggressive manner by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON]. A great deal of his criticism was legitimate. He said that the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds had been recommending bills with too large appropriations. I admit it. It is unavoidable. We have constructed this bill after long and deliberate reflection upon it and giving it all the attention that was possible, with the assistance of the Department, and it is the best that we can do. If the Senate do not choose to consider or pass it the responsibility is upon them, not upon the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. As I stated the other day, there is no part of my public duty so ungrateful and ungracious as my service upon that committee, being continually subjected to all sorts of personal solicitations and then to all sorts of criticisms as to the way in which we discharge our duty.

This is a great reform. It will get rid of great abuses. If it is a bill defective in details, let it be perfected. We are not here to say that it is perfect; but we are here to say that this is the result of honest and laborious effort and examination, and it is the best that that committee can do.

Mr. PADDOCK. Mr. President, the bill reported by the committee is a good bill so far as it goes; but in my judgment, and upon that judgment I have been acting from the first day I entered the Senate, it does not go far enough. It seems to me practicable and wise whenever we enter upon this legislation to make provision for the construction of all post-office buildings. In consonance with this view, and at an early day, I presented it to the Senate in a formulated measure—indeed, I think I had the honor to present the first bill that was ever introduced on this subject in either branch of Congress. It was based upon the theory that where the gross receipts had been $3,000 for three successive years, an office might be built, and that that should be the minimum—this would produce $9,000 for the minimum office—and that that should form the basis running through the whole list of offices for all public buildings. In a word, that post-office buildings might be constructed for all offices, but never to exceed in any case the gross annual receipts for three continuous years preceding.

This committee bill will not provide for the construction of a single building of the class or classes which are brought here for special legislation. It provides only for a smaller class of offices and will be in no sense a relief to Congress in respect of special acts, nor will it be a just thing to confine the construction of all these buildings to a particular class. Whenever the legislation is entered upon it ought to be made applicable to all post-offices. It will be found upon investigation that this rule applied to the appropriations for post-office buildings is a just and equitable one; that the sum of the gross receipts for three years makes just about the amount that would be properly required for the construction of an office for every town where the construction of a building would be allowed under the minimum rule referred to. And it will be found that this rule will also be just and proper in respect of populations of the towns in which buildings would be erected under its provisions.

I am very much in favor of the proposition proposed for the committee by my distinguished friend from Missouri [Mr. VEST], and of course if nothing further can be obtained than the enactment of a law based upon this bill I shall vote for it; but I think that while we are at it we should go further and provide for all post-office buildings under some such equitable rule as I have proposed.

I had prepared an amendment on the basis of my own bill now before the Senate in the nature of a substitute for the bill now under discussion covering this idea. In that bill there is a maximum limitation if it shall be necessary to curtail an appropriation below the amount that would necessarily follow where the receipts are very large. By it the discretion is given to the Secretary of the Treasury, the Postmaster-General, and the Secretary of the Interior, who are a board recognized in the present state of the law to govern and control such matters, that they may reduce the limit; that is, that it may be limited below the range of the general proposition as to the gross receipts limit, if in their judgment a lesser appropriation will be sufficient.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, it hardly seems to me that a bill of this importance can be considered under the five-minute rule, but I am going to make no objection to it on that ground. I do not know but that I should be in favor of some bill providing for the erection of reasonable buildings at places where the annual receipts of the post-office are $3,000 and upwards, but a very cursory consideration of this bill leads me to believe that it will be very unsatisfactory.

I have not had time to examine the Postmaster-General's report, which I have sent for, but I venture to say that there are in Connecticut twenty or perhaps thirty or more places which have annual receipts at their post-offices of more than $3,000 per annum. Among those there are as many as eight or ten places which have postal receipts running from $20,000 to $30,000 and $40,000. They are not included in the estimates which have been given us by the Senator from Nebraska. Take my own city, a city of 30,000 inhabitants, with postal receipts, I suppose, of $35,000 annually. We have no public building there. There are perhaps six or eight or ten such places in the State of Connecticut, similarly situated, with no public building.

Now, it would be a very great injustice to those cities, which have not been scrambling for public buildings, although they have been sadly needed, that we should pass a bill here which would expend, as I hastily figure it, at least $35,000,000 in providing public buildings for the little offices which have receipts exceeding $3,000, and leaving the large offices, where the buildings are more sadly needed, to the tender mercies of subsequent Congresses and of parties which are howling about a "billion-dollar Congress."

I do not think that is right, Mr. President, nor do I believe it is good judgment to give to any Postmaster-General, either present or prospective, the great right and discretion of saying where he will put up a $25,000 building with $5,000 sites in places that have $3,000 receipts. I believe that in three years' time it would become the subject of prolific criticism and would amount to a scandal.

Mr. PADDOCK. I should like to say to the Senator from Connecticut that in the report to which I have referred from the Post-Office Department, it is stated that the group of offices, the gross receipts of which are from $20,000 upwards and not exceeding $40,000, number one hundred and eight, and from $40,000 to $100,000 the number is thirty-eight.

I submit the full statement from which I quote. I will not ask now to have it read, but will ask that it may be printed as a part of my remarks.

The statement is as follows:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE FIRST ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
SALARY AND ALLOWANCE DIVISION,
Washington, D. C., January 19, 1892.

SIR: In reply to your verbal request relative to post-offices of the first, second, and third classes with gross receipts of $3,000 and upwards for three consecutive years, and number of Presidential offices not in Government buildings, in groups of receipts ranging about $3,000, $10,000, $20,000, $60,000, $100,000, and upwards, I beg to say that a statement covering the first request will be prepared, if necessary, but it will take some time to prepare the same.

On the basis of receipts for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1891, the number of Presidential offices not in Government buildings having receipts within range of limits of groups hereinafter stated are shown to be as follows:

Group.	Number of offices
Gross receipts, $3,000 and not exceeding $5,000	823
Gross receipts, $5,000 and not exceeding $20,000	909
Gross receipts, $20,000, and not exceeding $40,000	108
Gross receipts, $40,000 and not exceeding $100,000	38
Gross receipts, $100,000 and upwards	6
Total	1,084

For your further information I beg to inclose herewith the Annual Report of the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department showing, on pages 38 to 107, inclusive, the status of Presidential offices, in alphabetical order, by States and Territories, for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1891, column No. 2 showing the gross receipts which accrued at each office for the year ended June 30, 1891; also a printed list corrected to date, showing list of 165 post-offices now located in Government buildings.

Very respectfully,

S. A. WHITFIELD,
First Assistant Postmaster-General.

Hon. A. S. PADDOCK,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I have not examined this bill in detail, but in a general way I have been of the impression that some wiser and better method of appropriations for public buildings should be adopted by Congress, as in the nature of things under the present system inequalities exist as respects cities, towns, and localities. I am not quite sure that the imposition of all responsibility and discretion in the hands of the Postmaster-General will have a tendency to improve this condition. I think it is wiser and better that certainly at each session of Congress we should know how much money is to be expended or is being expended for public buildings.

There has been much criticism lately in certain quarters, not so much in the Senate as elsewhere, of a disposition to make what are called permanent or indefinite appropriations, and we have heard in various ways that all these things are to be reformed, and that we are to come back to the good old times when Congress shall have an opportunity of revising at each session and at each Congress all appropriations of public money, and that they shall undergo the immediate scrutiny of the two branches of Congress, in order that all opportunity for extravagance and misappropriation may be avoided. I am in sympathy with this view. I think myself that it is wiser and better that all appropriations should be made annually, unless it may be as respects a few things that require the maintenance of the public credit, such as interest upon the public debt, our obligations to Indian tribes, and other matters of a kindred nature.

Therefore, Mr. President, I shall oppose the provision in this bill which appropriates money, and I shall move, and do move now if there is no amendment pending, that the section in the bill providing for an appropriation be stricken from the bill, in order that when the Postmaster-General shall exercise the power given in the bill to distribute these public buildings equitably and ratably among the States Congress shall have an opportunity to revise, at least to a degree, the exercise of this discretion. So I hope the Senator from Missouri will allow me to move to strike out section 6 of the bill.

Mr. VEST. It is section 7. The Senator has not the right print before him.

Mr. ALLISON. I see I have the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska before me, and not the original bill. I move to strike out section 7 from the bill, so that no money can be expended under this arrangement until Congress shall have had an opportunity of investigating the subject.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, that is a matter which the committee submits with pleasure to the discretion of the Senate. I congratulate the country that the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations has come to the conclusion that there should be economy in public affairs. It is rather a novel spectacle that I am standing here even in seeming opposition to him on such a proposition. The difficulty during the last Congress was to stop appropriations anywhere. If there is a change for any reason, it is a matter of congratulation to the people of the United States.

Now, as to what has been said by the Senator from Nebraska, the bill which he offers as a substitute was before us when we drafted and reported the bill now pending before the Senate. The difference between that and the pending bill is that he limits the cost of these post-office buildings to the amount received for the three preceding years, the gross receipts, which would be $9,000. In our judgment that is not sufficient. The cost of labor and the cost of material varies throughout the country, as we all very well know, and there are sections of the Union, especially in the growing West and the Northwest, where $9,000 would not construct a building over which the flag of the United States ought to float. We limit the amount to $25,000, but if the Senate sees proper to put the limit at a lower figure it is for it to do so, and the responsibility must rest upon this body.

Mr. FRYE. Does that include the site?

Mr. VEST. That includes the whole thing. There is a provision in the bill also that the site may be purchased by the Government at a cost not exceeding $5,000; that condemnation proceedings may be had if it can not be obtained by a voluntary transfer. As a matter of course, there are difficulties——

Mr. HARRIS. Is that $5,000 to be deducted from the maximum amount for the building?

Mr. VEST. Yes, that would be deducted; the $5,000 would be taken out of the $25,000.

Mr. HARRIS. Making the cost of the building $20,000?

Mr. VEST. Yes, as a matter of course there are difficulties attending this sort of legislation, because it is a new departure. It is said that this bill is defective because it does not cover all cases; and the Senator from Nebraska suggests that we ought to pass a bill that will cover all public buildings throughout the United States. It is simply impossible to frame such a bill with the cities growing as rapidly as they are; with the necessities of the postal service increasing from year to year in a phenomenal ratio, it is impossible to fix the limitation for the expense of a building in the larger cities of the Union.

I repeat, and I can not impress it too much upon the Senate, that our whole idea in framing this bill, which is to a large extent tentative, is to do away with the abuse of making enormous appropriations, relatively considered as to the size of the towns, for post-office purposes. There is never any difficulty in securing an appropriation, no matter how large, for a town or a city where there are United States courts and internal-revenue offices. There the Government necessarily must have some building in which to transact all these various kinds of business. But the greatest difficulty that comes before Congress is in regard to towns where there is simply a post-office, and where there is no

Federal court and no branch of the internal-revenue service. This bill is constructed to meet that difficulty.

I do not know whether a majority of the Senate will agree with me or not, but I have always held to the proposition, and hold myself entirely responsible for it and act upon it, that the Government of the United States should not rent any buildings for public purposes. It is a shame that to-day we are paying in the city of Washington one hundred and eighty-odd thousand dollars rent, and we have had heretofore an overflowing Treasury. I saw a statement in the public press yesterday to the effect that the Census Bureau has now moved out of a building where they were paying $7,500 a year to one where they will pay $17,500 a year. That sort of thing has been going on in the city of Washington from year to year during all my service in Congress. We are actually paying to-day, and I will undertake to prove it, half the value of the property in the city of Washington as yearly rent. We have taken old dilapidated buildings that were unfit for residences, patched them up at the expense of the Government, and paid enormous rents, and we are doing the same thing here to-day. The Government to-day is occupying buildings for Governmental purposes in the city of Washington that are unsafe and insecure on account of being exposed to fire from adjacent tenements, and the public documents are in danger of being consumed every night while so occupied.

I confess, and I state it frankly, that I believe the Government should own its property when necessary to carry on the public business; and I repeat, in addition to that, that in my judgment no expenditure is so defensible as the appropriations made in the smaller towns of the United States for post-office buildings. The Post-Office Department is omnipresent. There is no branch of this Government so popular in its application to the business of the country as the post-office, and we simply desire in this bill, subject to the criticism and amendment of the Senate, to get rid of the abuse which comes to us session after session, where we are asked to appropriate for a post-office building $100,000 or $150,000 or $200,000 in a town or city where the gross receipts of the post-office do not amount to $3,000 annually.

If there is any amendment to be proposed to the bill limiting the amount of expenditure, we are ready to consider it; but the principle of the bill, the system we seek to establish, is what is now urged upon the Senate in the interest of economy and the public service.

Mr. PADDOCK. My objection to the Senator's bill is that it does not relieve the situation which he claims could be relieved by the passage of the bill. It does not reach at all the class of buildings for which appropriations are made here by special acts.

Some time since I referred the bill which I had the honor to introduce five years ago, and which has been constantly before the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, but has never reached the Senate, because the view of the committee has not been in accord with the theory upon which it was drawn, to the office of the Supervising Architect for a report as to his views respecting its provisions, etc. The Supervising Architect submitted to me an amendment in the nature of a substitute for my own bill, but on similar lines with my own. I will now, for the information of the Senate respecting the views of the Supervising Architect, present the amendment reported by him, to be hereafter proposed by me as an amendment in the nature of a substitute for this bill, when this bill shall again come up for consideration. I also present the letter of the Supervising Architect explanatory of the amendment, and ask that the same may be printed as part of my remarks, for the information of the Senate. I also ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD the letter from the Post-Office Department from which I have quoted, at the request of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT].

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DAVIS in the chair). The Chair hears no objection, and the proposed amendment and accompanying papers will be printed.

The letter and amendment referred to are as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SUPERVISING ARCHITECT,
Washington, D. C., January 18, 1892.

DEAR SIR: Referring to your recent conversation at this office in regard to making a report upon Senate bill No. 379, introduced by you December 10, 1891, "to provide for the erection of public buildings for post-offices in towns and cities where the annual post-office receipts for three years preceding have exceeded $3,000 annually," I have the honor to advise you that upon further examination it has been found that the Senate Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds have not requested a report from this Department upon said bill, and that it is the practice of this Department, as stated on pages 11 and 12 of the Report of the Supervising Architect of the Treasury Department for the year ending September 30, 1891, to only make reports upon bills introduced in Congress to provide for the acquisition of sites and erection thereon of public buildings in such cases as the Senate and House Committees on Public Buildings and Grounds may request them.

Without making any expression in regard to the advisability of the method proposed by said bill in providing for the erection of public buildings, I would respectfully suggest that in my opinion the bill contains a number of provisions which would make the method a difficult one to put into practical operation.

The arguments which have heretofore prevailed in Congress seem to indicate that the opinions as expressed all go to support the advisability of the method to have all plans for all public buildings prepared in the office of the Supervising Architect of the Treasury Department, and approved by the Postmaster-General, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Secretary of the Interior, as proposed by section 1 of said bill.

The same observation may be made in regard to the view that has heretofore prevailed that it is most advisable that any bill authorizing the construction of a public building for the use of the post-office and other branches of public service should direct that the same be done under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury and the Supervising Architect of the Treasury, as proposed by section 2 of said bill.

In view of the above, the advisability will no doubt be admitted that in all cases where the Secretary of the Treasury is directed to acquire a site and to cause to be erected thereon a public building the work should be done under the office of the Supervising Architect of the Treasury, as at present and heretofore. The right to determine all questions in regard to the materials, fixtures, apparatus, etc., to be used in the construction of said building should be with the Secretary of the Treasury and the office of the Supervising Architect, instead of, as proposed by section 2 of said bill, by the Postmaster-General, Secretary of the Treasury, and the Secretary of the Interior, subject to the approval of the President.

It would seem advisable that if the discretionary power is to be vested in any other authority than Congress for determining the cities wherein public buildings shall be erected at a cost based upon the aggregate for three years of the post-office receipts of cities where the post-office receipts shall have exceeded a given amount per annum for the three preceding years that it should properly be vested in the Secretary of the Treasury and Postmaster-General jointly, and that their recommendation in each case should be subject to the approval of the President, as proposed by section 2 of said bill.

The further provisions of section 3 of said bill that contracts shall be let to the lowest best bidders, from the standpoint of excellence of materials and responsibility of the bidders, after the usual advertisement for competitive proposals under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, is in full accord with existing law and the practice which has prevailed and now prevails in this Department.

It is observed that section 3 of said bill provides that the Postmaster-General shall be vested with authority to procure sites for the buildings which said bill proposes to provide for, and it may be stated that said provision would be objectionable for the reason that it would divide the departmental action and transactions in regard to the acquisition of property for the site and the construction of the building between the Postmaster-General and the Secretary of the Treasury, and would necessarily entail considerable complications in regard to making expenditures from the appropriation which the bill proposes to provide for the purposes of the bill and in the keeping of the accounts in regard thereto, and would scatter the title papers and the other necessary records and files in several places, instead of having the same in one place (the office of the Supervising Architect of the Treasury Department), as now required, with advantage and convenience by existing regulations and practice.

It would seem more practical, and in the interest of expeditious and advantageous results, if said section 3 of said bill should provide that the Secretary of the Treasury shall be the officer who shall acquire properties for the sites for such buildings, as is done now in each case where a separate bill authorizes the acquisition of a site and the erection thereon of a public building for the use and accommodation of the post-office and other Government offices in any particular city, thereby making it the right of one executive officer to control all matters pertaining to the acquisition of a site and the erection thereon of a public building, and the making of all expenditures connected therewith, and the keeping of all accounts relative thereto in connection with the appropriation therefor.

The provisions of said section 3 of said bill, which prohibit the expenditure of any moneys from the appropriation until after titles to properties for sites for such buildings as the bill proposes to provide for, shall have been approved by the Attorney-General and jurisdiction thereover shall have been ceded from the States in which the buildings are to be erected to the United States, is in full accord with existing law and the practice which has prevailed, and is now prevailing in the Department, in such cases.

The provisions of section 4 of said bill practically covers the same grounds as is covered by existing law in regard to reporting to Congress each year all transactions had, contracts made, and appropriations made, and estimates of appropriations for public buildings, and in addition thereto imposes the further duty of reporting to Congress a list of the buildings, with the estimated cost thereof, proposed to be erected under the provisions of the bill during each ensuing fiscal year.

Section 5 of said bill only provides that it shall be the duty of the Postmaster-General, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Secretary of the Interior, to decide the cases in which it may be deemed expedient to have such buildings as the bill proposes to provide for, furnish accommodations for other branches of the public service than the postal service.

As public buildings mainly provide accommodations for the proper accommodations, and the transaction of the public business connected with the Treasury Department (customs, internal revenue, etc.), Department of Justice (United States courts, etc.), and the Post-Office Department (post-offices, etc.), it would seem advisable that the said section should designate the Attorney-General, together with the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Postmaster-General, instead of the Secretary of the Interior, who shall decide said question.

It is observed that section 6 of said bill only provides for making an appropriation for carrying out the provisions of said bill.

It is also observed that section 7 of said bill provides that the bill is not intended to interfere with any other law, or any other buildings erected, or to be erected, under any special acts of Congress.

While I have complied with your request in making comments in regard to said bill, and might state that, with the experience developed by the practical operations of this office for the past thirty-seven years in regard to the law pertaining to public buildings, suggestions, which might be considered improvements in the bill, could be made which would simplify operations thereunder, and prevent any complications in its execution should it become a law, I do not desire, and do not intend that anything herein contained should be considered as any expression on my part as to the advisability, or in advocacy of the method proposed by the bill becoming a law, instead of having the authority remain solely with Congress, where it has always been vested, in regard to exercising discretion, and reaching a decision, as to the cities wherein each public building should be erected, and the limit of cost of the same.

Should you so desire I shall be pleased to confer with you further at any time in regard to the subject.

Respectfully yours,

W. J. EDBROOKE,
Supervising Architect.

Hon. A. S. PADDOCK,
United States Senate.

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, February 3, 1892.

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. PADDOCK to the bill (S. 427) to provide for the erection of public buildings for post-offices in towns and cities where the post-office receipts for the three years preceding have exceeded $3,000 annually.

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Secretary of the Treasury and the Postmaster-General, shall, from time to time, in their discretion, determine the cities in which shall be erected public buildings for the use and accommodation of the post-office and other Government offices located therein, not exceeding fifty in any one fiscal year, from among the various cities in the United States wherein the postal receipts for three years preceding have exceeded the sum of $10,000 and have been less than $30,000: Provided, That such buildings shall be equally distributed in the different sections of the country, and that the decision in each case reached by the Secretary of the Treasury and the Postmaster-General, shall be submitted to, and approved by, the President of the United States: And provided further, That the cost of each site and building, complete—including heating apparatus, elevators, and approaches when necessary—exclusively for the use and accommodation of the post-office, shall not exceed the aggregate of the postal receipts of the city wherein it may be so decided to erect a public building under the provisions of this act for three years preceding; except in such cases wherein it may be decided by the Secretary of the Treasury, the Postmaster-General, and the Attorney-General, that the building should provide accommodations for the needs of the customs, internal revenue, United States courts, and land office, or other branches of the public service, in addition to the postal service, in which cases the cost of each site and building, complete—including heating apparatus, elevators, and approaches when necessary—shall not exceed a sum equal to two and one-half times the aggregate of the postal receipts of the city for three years preceding: And provided further, That the plans, and detailed estimates of cost, for each of said buildings, shall be prepared in the office of the Supervising Architect of the Treasury Department, and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, the Postmaster-General, and the Secretary of the Interior, after the property for the site for such building shall have been selected by the Secretary of the Treasury, and the State in which the city is located wherein the building is to be erected shall have ceded to the United States exclusive jurisdiction over such property, and the Attorney-General shall have rendered a favorable opinion in regard to the validity of title to such property, and payment of the purchase money therefor shall have been made by the Secretary of the Treasury.

SEC. 2. That in each case wherein it may be decided to acquire a site and erect thereon a public building under the provisions of section 1 of this act, the Secretary of the Treasury shall acquire by purchase, condemnation, donation, or otherwise, property suitably and conveniently located for the site, and if by purchase or condemnation the price paid for such property shall not exceed an amount that will leave a sufficient balance of the amount determined upon as the cost of the site and building under the provisions of section 1 of this act to permit the construction of the building complete—including heating apparatus, elevators, and approaches when necessary—under the following provisions:

Proposals for the sale or donation of land suitably and conveniently located for the site shall be invited by public advertisements in one or more of the newspapers having the largest circulation in the city wherein the building is to be erected, for at least fourteen days prior to the date specified in said advertisements for the opening of said proposals.

The proposals made in response to said advertisements shall be addressed and mailed to the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall cause the same to be opened and scheduled, and thereafter direct an agent of the Treasury Department to visit the city and make a personal inspection of the properties so offered, and such other properties as the agent may deem suitable, and to receive such further proposals as may be submitted, and to submit his written report to the Secretary of the Treasury of the results of his examination, and his recommendation in regard to the property that should be selected, and his reasons therefor, and to accompany said report with the proposals, and all maps, plats, and statements which may have come into his possession during his examination of the subject, with the indorsement of the Supervising Architect of the Treasury Department as to the suitability of the property recommended from an architectural standpoint, or as to grades, elevations, character of ground for foundations, sewerage, etc.

If upon consideration of the agent's reports and recommendation and the accompanying papers the Secretary of the Treasury shall deem further investigation necessary, he may appoint a commission of not more than three persons, two of whom shall be citizens of the State and nonresidents of the city in which the building is to be erected, and one of whom shall be an officer of the office of the Supervising Architect of the Treasury Department, and to direct such commission to examine all of the properties offered, and such others as they may deem suitable, and to receive such other proposals as may be submitted and to grant such hearings in relation thereto as they may deem necessary, and to require said commission, within fifteen days after making such examination, to submit their written report to the Secretary of the Treasury, with their recommendation and their reasons therefor, accompanied by all statements, maps, plats, and other documents which may come into their possession during such examination, with the indorsement of the Supervising Architect of the Treasury Department as to the suitability of the property recommended from an architectural standpoint, or as to grades, elevations, character of ground for foundation, sewerage, etc., and the Secretary of the Treasury may thereafter finally determine the location of the building either upon the report and recommendation of the agent or of the report and recommendation of the commission, or by selecting such other property as he may deem best to meet the interests of the public service.

In cases where the Secretary of the Treasury may decide to appoint such a commission in connection with the selection of property, he may allow a compensation not exceeding $5 per day to each of said commissioners, except the officer of the Treasury Department, and may also allow the traveling and subsistence expenses of each of said commissioners, including the officer of the Treasury Department, and shall require each of them to submit with their report, the affidavit or affirmation required by act of Congress approved June 23, 1874, section 2, page 276, volume 18, Statutes at Large.

Payment of the purchase money for such property as may be selected for a site for such building shall not be made by the Secretary of the Treasury until after the Attorney-General shall have rendered a favorable opinion in regard to the validity of the title to the property, and the State wherein the city is located in which such building is to be erected shall have ceded exclusive jurisdiction to the United States over such property, during such time as the United States shall be or remain the owner thereof, for all purposes except the administration of the criminal laws of said State and the service of civil process therein, as required by act of Congress approved September 11, 1841, section 355, United States Revised Statutes.

In each case wherein the Secretary of the Treasury may deem it advisable for any reason that such property as may be selected as a site for such building shall be acquired by condemnation, he shall be governed by the provisions of act of Congress approved August 1, 1888, chapter 728, page 357, volume 25, United States Statutes at Large.

Each building erected under the provisions of this act shall be unexposed to danger from fire by an open space of at least 40 feet on each side, including streets and alleys.

So much of the amount which may be set aside from the appropriation made for carrying out the provisions of this act, as the limit of cost of the site and building in any particular city, under the provisions of section 1 of this act, as may be necessary for the payment of the incidental expenses such as advertisements for proposals, surveys, tests, compensation and traveling and subsistence expenses of agents and commissioners, etc., in connection with the acquisition of property for the site, shall be immediately available.

So much of said amount as may be necessary for the preparation of plans, detailed estimates, etc., by the Supervising Architect of the Treasury Department shall be available immediately after the selection by the Secretary of the Treasury of property for the site.

No expenditure from said amount in connection with the work of constructing the building shall be made until after title to the property selected for the site shall have been vested in the United States in accordance with the provisions of section 2 of this act.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall require all transactions in regard to making expenditures and entering into contracts for any labor and materials required for the construction of the building under the office of the Supervising Architect of the Treasury Department, to be in full accordance with the requirements of the various United States statutes relating thereto.

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall require the Supervising Architect, through him, to annually report to Congress each building which it may be decided to erect under section 1 of this act, and all contracts, etc., which may be entered into in regard to each of them.

SEC. 5. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall annually report to Congress in the Estimates of Appropriations, the location and estimated cost of each of such buildings as it may be decided to erect under the provisions of section 1 of this act, each year, after the close of the fiscal year following the passage of this act.

SEC. 6. That there be, and is hereby, appropriated, out of any moneys in the United States Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $3,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary for carrying out the provisions of this act during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1893, and that so much of said $3,000,000 as may be required to cover the aggregate of the limits of cost of such buildings as it may be decided within the fiscal year ending June 30, 1893, to erect under the provisions of this act, shall continue available in the manner herein provided until the completion of each of such buildings and the payment of all contract liabilities in connection therewith.

SEC. 7. That nothing contained in this act shall be considered or understood as in any way interfering with any law or laws relating to any public buildings now erected, being erected, or hereafter to be erected, under any special acts of Congress and appropriations therefor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business.

PRINTING AND DISTRIBUTION OF DOCUMENTS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1549) providing for the public printing and binding, and the distribution of public documents.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The reading of the bill will be proceeded with.

The Chief Clerk read from section 36 to section 46 of the bill.

Mr. MANDERSON. I move to strike out the words "printers and binders" in line 2 of section 46, and insert in lieu of those words the word "workmen." This brings the section so that it is identical with the present law. The law was changed from "workmen" to "printers and binders," as it is in the bill before us, because it seemed to the committee as rather an unnecessary thing that the common laborers of the Public Printing Office should be required to be skilled in their respective branches of industry. It was not supposed that to wheel a barrow or to perform the work of a charwoman any particular skill was needed. We thought that these were hardly skilled laborers. But in that definite place we are apt to refer to in this body as "elsewhere," I notice that there was criticism upon this change of words. The committee certainly had no object in view except what I have stated, to prevent that which seemed unnecessary; but I am sufficiently sensitive under the criticism to feel like restoring the old language, and therefore offer the amendment that I propose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chief Clerk will report the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 46, line 2, strike out the words "printers and binders" and insert the word "workmen;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 46. It shall be the duty of the Public Printer to employ workmen who are thoroughly skilled in their respective branches of industry, as shown by trial of their skill under his direction.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Chief Clerk read sections 47 and 48 of the bill.

Mr. MANDERSON. I offer an amendment to come in at the end of section 48. I move to add the words:

But the provisions of the eight-hour law shall be rigidly enforced.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. MANDERSON. I desire to say with reference to the proposed amendment that I believe the provisions of the eight-hour law have been strictly and rigidly enforced in the Government Printing Office, although I have seen in a statement elsewhere the charge made that that is not true. Certainly the Public Printer is a man disposed to obey the law, and I do not think that any person would reflect in any way upon Printer Palmer, who has made certainly a most efficient officer. For fear, however, that it might be considered that this section 48, which provides that when the exigencies of the public service may require it, the Public Printer shall cause work to be done at night as well as through the day, might be subject to some construction that it was designed as an indirect repeal of the eight-hour law so far as it applies to the Printing Office, we think it well to insert the amendment.

The only place in the statutes where any legislation of this sort has been had outside of the general eight-hour law, was in an appropriation act that passed, I think, two or three years ago, in which this identical language occurred. As I say, it did not seem necessary to the Committee on Printing that we should specifically order the Public Printer to obey the law, no matter what might be the nature or character of the law, but we desire to have the bill, so far as it can be made to do so, conform even to the whims of those who object to it on that account.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to ask the Senator if the greater part of the work there is not piecework and hour work. The great bulk of the men are paid by the hour, and if they work seven hours they are paid for it, if they work six hours they are paid for it, and if they work eight or nine hours they are paid for it. That is what I understand. It is a less material question there than almost anywhere else.

Mr. MANDERSON. I quite agree with the Senator. This is the condition: The compositors work by the thousand ems, as is usual in all printing-offices. Most of the skilled workmen work by the piece. Of course, those who are engaged in presswork, and work of that character, work by the hour. There are some who are employed by the day. Their number, however, is limited as compared with those who work by the piece and by the hour. But as Congress saw fit in the appropriation act of a few years ago to challenge the direct attention of the Public Printer to the eight-hour law, there certainly can be no objection to our repeating it here, although I think it is surplusage.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to ask the Senator if he knows the custom there, as to whether the employés who work by the day go to the Printing Office at the same hour that they do in the other Departments and leave at the same hour?

Mr. MANDERSON. I can not give accurate information on that subject.

Mr. COCKRELL. We have an eight-hour law, a very important one——

Mr. MANDERSON. I may say this: My impression is that those who work by the day work by some system of reliefs, because during the session of Congress the Public Printing Office is of course at work both night and day.

Mr. COCKRELL. The law is that eight hours form a working day, and the Departments ignore the law by working six hours and a half a day, and they call that a day. If eight hours be a day's work eight hours' work ought to be performed. I confess frankly that I have not any very great amount of sympathy with less than eight hours' work, and if we have prescribed that eight hours shall be a day's work we ought to see that eight hours are worked by the employés of the Government. It is nothing but right and fair and just. It is not the number of hours that the great masses of the people engaged in carrying on the business of this country work, for most of them work even longer than that when they are working at their own affairs.

It seems we hedge in by an eight-hour law and then allow six hours and a half work to be performed and call that a day's work. That is the reason why I asked as to whether the same custom prevails in the Public Printing Office in regard to the hours of work that prevails in the Executive Departments, where the employés go in at 9 o'clock and go out at 4, and have half an hour's recess for lunch?

Mr. MANDERSON. I do not think that is true of the Public Printing Office. I think the employés work eight hours a day.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to inquire of the Senator where the work is six and a half hours a day?

Mr. COCKRELL. It was so in the Interior Department, I understand, when the distinguished Senator from Colorado was Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to inquire if the Senator understands that the statute which was passed some years ago with reference to laborers applies to clerks in the Departments.

Mr. COCKRELL. A great many of the employés in the Departments have been here from time immemorial nearly trying to get a law to authorize them again to sue in order that they may recover compensation when they have been at work in the navy-yards and other branches of the service, and I supposed it applied to employés of the Government, as it was intended to apply in that way.

Mr. TELLER. I think if the Senator will reflect a minute he will readily admit that under no Administration, either Democratic or Republican, has there been any such rule applied to the clerical force of the Departments.

Mr. COCKRELL. If the Senator will just permit me to interrupt him: I admit that under the Democratic Administration the same rule was pursued that had been pursued before. I am not criticising the Senator when he was Secretary of the Interior, but I am simply stating the fact, that while we are legislating here to limit the hours of work in a day to eight hours, we permit fron fifteen to twenty-five thousand employés of the Governmsnt to work six hours and a half and call that a day's work.

Mr. TELLER. What time do the employés commence work in the Departments of the Government now? At what time in the morning? At 9 o'clock, is it not?

Mr. COCKRELL. At 9 o'clock.

Mr. TELLER. And they work until 4?

Mr. COCKRELL. They work until 4 and have half an hour for lunch. That leaves the working time six and a half hours exactly.

Mr. TELLER. That has been the custom from time immemorial. The Senator from Missouri is the first person I have heard suggest that the eight-hour law applied to that class of people. I do not think it applies to them any more than it does to the members of this body. That has been the ruling of the Departments, as I say, for many years, in every branch.

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him there?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Departments by express authority of law have power to fix the hours, and therefore they have fixed these hours. If it were not for that, the eight-hour law would be just as compulsory upon them to work that number of hours as they can now work less. They have fixed less. It used to be eight hours. In the last twenty or twenty-five years the work was required to be performed, my recollection is, in the Departments here under the law, long before any eight-hour law was ever passed, and the law authorized the Departments to fix the number of hours the employés should work.

Mr. TELLER. That is what I was about to say, that the law authorizing the heads of Departments to fix the number of hours was passed long before the eight-hour law. That law was never supposed to have any reference to the Departments. The eight-hour law was passed for the purpose of protecting the men who labor principally in the navy-yards, and that class of occupations. It has been largely a dead letter until very recently, I will admit, but I never heard before, I repeat, that it does apply to the Executive Departments.

I would say to the Senator, after some little observation in that line, that six hours and a half is as much time as should be given to the class of clerical work here performed; that when a clerk who is engaged in the labor that the great majority of them are has put in six hours and a half he has put in time enough. When he is required to put in more time than that he will not do good work. Of course there are occasions when a clerk can for a short time (and that has been done in all the Departments) serve an hour or two or two or three hours more in a day, but that can not be continual. The experience of the Departments has demonstrated that six and a half hours, or from 9 o'clock until 4, with half an hour's intermission for lunch, is all that can be profitably exacted from the clerks.

Mr. COCKRELL. I desire to call the Senator's attention to the law. By section 162 the hours of labor in all the executive branches of the Government are fixed.

I read section 162 of the Revised Statutes:

SEC. 162. From the 1st day of October until the 1st day of April in each year all the bureaus and offices in the State, War, Treasury, Navy, and Post-Office Departments and in the General Land Office shall be open for the transaction of the public business at least eight hours in each day; and from the 1st day of April until the 1st day of October in each year at least ten hours in each day, except Sundays and days declared public holidays by law.

In the Statutes at Large, volume 18, page 109, we find this provision:

That it shall be the duty of the heads of the several Executive Departments and the heads of the respective bureaus therein, in the interests of the public service, to require of all clerks of class 1 and above, and of chiefs of divisions, such hours of labor as may be deemed necessary for the proper dispatch of the public business, not exceeding, however, the time for which said Departments are by law required to be open for business, any usage to the contrary notwithstanding.

Then we find under section 161:

The head of each Department is authorized to prescribe regulations, not inconsistent with law, for the government of his Department, the conduct of its officers and clerks, the distribution and performance of its business, and the custody, use, and preservation of the records, papers, and property appertaining to it.

Then section 169 provides:

That each head of a Department is authorized to employ in his Department such number of clerks of the several classes recognized by law, and such messengers, assistant messengers, copyists, watchmen, laborers, and other employés, and at such rates of compensation, respectively, as may be appropriated for by Congress from year to year.

Notwithstanding that provision of law, under the authority of regulating the business, they have reduced the hours from eight from October 1 to April 1 and ten from April 1 to October 1 to six and a half hours practically, and the result of that or of something else is that there are large arrearages of business in almost every branch of the public service, thousands of cases waiting to be disposed of, and they are unable to keep the business current.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CALL in the chair). The question is on the adoption of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. TELLER. What is that amendment? Let it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add to section 48:

But the provisions of the eight-hour law shall be rigidly enforced.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, I suppose that every statute is rigidly enforced. When we enact a law against stealing, we say it shall be rigidly enforced; against murder, it shall be rigidly enforced; against embezzlement, and all that. I do not fancy saying at the end of a United States statute, "Now, we are in dead earnest about this law." An expression of that kind does not occur anywhere in the statute book that I know of. Here is one particular law where we say we mean this. Suppose we say, "But the provisions of the existing eight-hour law shall apply." We have provided for day work and night work at random, as the necessities may demand, and I have no objection to it, because that is the law now. I have no objection to saying, in addition, "But the provisions of the existing eight-hour law shall apply." I move that substitute.

Mr. MANDERSON. I think that is very much better language. The only reason why this language was used was because it is the identical language of the appropriation act to which I referred.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska modifies his amendment. The amendment will be reported as modified.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add to the section:

But the provisions of the existing eight-hour law shall apply.

Mr. COCKRELL. It does not make any difference one way or another, so far as that is concerned.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as modified.

The amendment as modified was agreed to.

The Chief Clerk read section 49 of the bill, as follows:

SEC. 49. The Public Printer may employ two clerks of class 4, at an annual salary of $1,800 each; two clerks of class 3, at $1,600 each per annum; one clerk of class 2, at $1,400 per annum.

Mr. COCKRELL. As I understand, these clerks come under the classified civil-service law.

Mr. MANDERSON. I am told by the clerk of the Committee on Printing Records that they do not. I have myself no information upon that subject. I do not think the Public Printing Office has by any rule ever been placed under the provisions of the civil-service law.

Mr. COCKRELL. I understand that the employés as a rule in the Public Printing Office have not been. There are clerks in the Agricultural Department that have not been put under the civil-service law to the full extent, and most of the employés in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing have not been put under the civil-service law; but wherever we designate clerks by classes 1, 2, 3, and 4, my understanding is that they then come under the civil-service law; and that is just the question I wanted to ask.

Mr. MANDERSON. There is no change in that regard, as I remember. I will turn to the provision of the Revised Statutes upon which this is based, and I think we shall find that the language is the same. Section 3762 provides:

The Congressional Printer may employ four clerks at an annual salary of $1,800 each; and one clerk at an annual salary of $1,400, to have charge of the accounts with the Departments and public offices.

Now, taking that as the basis of this section and then looking to the appropriation acts which appropriate the sums of money that should be the compensation of these different clerks, the result was this section. If it is subject to the criticism that by saying they are clerks of a certain class they shall be brought under the operation of the civil-service law, that certainly was not the intention of the committee. It may be that it would be desirable simply to say "two clerks at an annual salary of $1,800 each," striking out their classification. I have no desire to place them under the civil-service law.

Mr. COCKRELL. I was simply asking for information as to whether they came under the law or not. I am not criticising it, but simply asking for information.

Mr. MANDERSON. I understand they do not, nor do I desire that they should be; and if the result of this language classifying the clerks is to bring them under the operation of that law, then I do not think the committee desire to use that language.

Mr. TELLER. I believe it will.

Mr. MANDERSON. Then we can strike it out. I move to strike out those words.

Mr. COCKRELL. If in the appropriation acts this language is used, classifying them as class 3 and class 4, I shall certainly protest against trampling under foot now the civil-service law, and I call upon my distinguished friend from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] to aid me in securing the recognition and enforcement of that law. I do not think it would be right here in this bill to undertake in this way to take out from under the operation of the civil-service law clerks here and there. If that is to be the policy, you can just honeycomb the whole work and destroy its practical effect and usefulness.

Mr. TELLER. I suggest to the Senator from Missouri that if there is no class defined undoubtedly they will be outside the civil-service law, but the President can include them, notwithstanding that.

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. It is in the power of the President. The question is, we having left this whole question to the Executive as to the classified service, whether we want to legislate anybody in or not.

Mr. COCKRELL. If we have already heretofore legislated on the question we are not legislating them in, but we are legislating them out. That is the question I am raising, whether they have not been, in appropriation acts providing for the public printing heretofore, put in by classes, and if they have, we are taking them out from under the civil-service law and regulations by this section.

Mr. DAWES. I do not understand that the law has extended the civil service to the employés of the Printing Bureau. I am quite sure that that is not the law

Mr. COCKRELL. Not to employés of the Printing Bureau, certainly.

Mr. DAWES. It may not apply——

Mr. COCKRELL. I know it does not apply to all.

Mr. DAWES. But as the Senator from Colorado says, the whole civil-service system could have been just as well created by an executive order as by an enactment. The virtue of the enactment is that it compels the Executive to do what he could have otherwise done without any legislation. That is the difference, and the sole difference.

Now, as the Senator says, the question is whether we shall put under law the extension or whether we shall leave the Executive to extend it. These employés are of such a peculiar character that it seems to me that an Executive of a proper disposition towards the civil service would extend it of his own motion as far as experience would dictate. I may be mistaken about that.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, I have been so long acquainted with my honorable friend from Missouri that I can generally tell when he is "writing sarcastic," as Artemus Ward says. I have a suspicion that he was not seriously troubled about the idea that the Public Printer should have the individual selection of five clerks who live right around him, under his elbow every day, and upon whom he is as dependent as upon his daily bread for his success in his business. There is no violation of a proper civil-service spirit in giving him that appointment, and if the Senator were in that place, or I, which Heaven forbid, for it is the worst place in the Government to work, I would not stay there unless I could have a personal selection of the six or eight of the chief persons around me. Nobody would think of such a thing any more than he would have his wife and children selected for him.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Public Printer has the appointment of his chief clerk and all the other officers from the highest to the lowest, unless it is these four or five clerks, who are not confidential clerks, but who are merely doing clerical work. The point I am making is that if they are now under the civil-service law and regulations we must not by legislation take them out. I am not insisting on putting them there if they are not already there, but if they are there and we are to take them out, let us do it boldly and openly and proclaim to the world that we are doing it.

I am glad that the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts has confessed that the civil-service law gave the President not one particle of power or authority that he did not possess before. I tried to convince him when that civil-service law was passed here, in a long speech showing the law and the Constitution, that the President had every particle of power without the passage of that law that he had with it, and we only consented to vote to do it because our Republican friends said that their Republican President would not exercise the power he had and they wanted us to join in compelling him to carry out what he had already the right and power to do. We gave them the civil-service law, and now I do not intend, if I can help it, that they shall clandestinely, as it were, or unknowingly, as it were, repeal any part of it or any of its regulations.

Mr. DAWES. I am sorry the Senator spent so much time with shooting into the air. I stood on record, before I came into this body, in the other branch, announcing just exactly what I have said to-day. It is not a confession of mine; it is a conviction of mine. I introduced myself into an appropriation bill the very first paragraph of legislation that has ever gone on the statute books in reference to civil service, and it is there to-day. It was put in about four hours before the session terminated, in a committee of conference of which I happened to be one. The Senator is a good deal behind the time if he talks about my confessing to his argument.

Mr. COCKRELL. Oh, Mr. President, I did not refer to the individual views of the distinguished Senator. I supposed that he was simply a representative of the great party of which he is a member, and I referred to him as the party, not as an individual. It was the party that I meant when I referred to the confession he made.

Mr. MANDERSON. If I may——

Mr. COCKRELL. I think we had better pass this section over until we can look at the appropriation acts and see whether these officials have by law and regulation been brought under the civil-service law. If they have, I insist that they shall remain there.

Mr. MANDERSON. That duty is already performed. If the Senator will allow me to interrupt him I will give him full information on the subject.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am not trying to take advantage of it. I am willing that the responsibility of the enforcement of that law shall rest on the existing Administration.

Mr. MANDERSON. I hope that the debate on this whole bill will not degenerate into a discussion of the merits of the civil-service law or the comparison of records of the Senators on that important piece of legislation. If it should, I fear that debate on this bill will be as great an abuse of the printing privilege as one can point out in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

I have looked up the matter to which the Senator has referred, and I find that in the appropriation bills the language is identical with the language of this bill. For instance, turning to the last revision of the statutes, the Supplement, the second edition, I find that the Public Printer was authorized to emply three additional clerks of the third class. Turning to the appropriation act, found on page 914, volume 26, I find an appropriation for the compensation of the Public Printer, $4,500; for the chief clerk, $2,400; two clerks of class 4, two clerks of class 3, and one clerk of class 2; in all, $15,100.

The effect of this legislation was not to take these clerks under the direction of the civil-service law, for they are not there now and they never have been, so that by adopting the language that is reported in the bill there is no danger of changing the present status of these clerks.

Mr. HAWLEY. I wish to put myself right on this momentous question, Mr. President. If those clerks are under the civil service, and the Public Printer can get good clerks in that way, I am satisfied to let it remain so; but if, on the other hand, they are not under the civil service, and he gets good clerks, and the Public Printer likes that system, I am willing it should stay so. I want the work done well there, and I want the Public Printer to have no excuse for not doing it well.

The Chief Clerk read from section 50 to section 52, inclusive.

Section 53 was read, as follows:

SEC. 53. The Public Printer may sell to any person additional or duplicate stereotype or electrotype plates from which any Government publication was printed, at a price not to exceed the cost of the metal and making to the Government and 10 per cent added: Provided, That the full amount of the price shall be paid when the order is filed.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to know what is going to be the operation of that section.

Mr. MANDERSON. This section is inserted at the suggestion not only of gentlemen prominently connected with the Public Printing Office, but of many of those who deal in Government publications.

Under the law as it exists any private individual has the right, before the matter went finally to press and the types were distributed, or before the final printing of the matter, after the electrotype plates were made, to order any quantity that he might be pleased to order of the publications of the Government. We limit that power under this bill by providing that no man shall order beyond 250 copies.

There are documents, we are told, that it is important and valuable to the country should be printed in larger number than the Government is willing to print them for gratuitous distribution, and if these duplicate electrotype plates can be sold to publishing houses, they will, as a private enterprise, get out many of these publications in large degree. Upon this showing, it was thought well to insert a section which would permit that to be done. It can not now be done under the construction of the statute by the Public Printer.

Mr. COCKRELL. I forgot to call the attention of the Senator to the clause limiting the purchase by private individuals to 250 copies. Why limit it? If the Government gets paid the cost of the printing and 10 per cent additional, why shall we restrict the number to 250 to any one individual and then authorize the plates to be sold? Are these original plates left in the office?

Mr. MANDERSON. No; the office retains the electrotype plates. Those it never parts with; but a duplicate of those plates can be made and sold to any person at cost who may desire them.

Mr. COCKRELL. Why shall we do that instead of printing the copies if the Government gets paid in full?

Mr. MANDERSON. I certainly do not think it advisable, if there should be a desirable publication, for which there shall be a larger demand than the issue of the book by the Government, that some book-dealer should order thousands of that publication at the mere cost of the presswork and the paper, that he might privately speculate upon it. It was well enough I thought to do that to a limited extent, but not a very large one.

Mr. COCKRELL. I thought they did not get them at simply cost of the paper and material. I thought it was the cost of the publication and 10 per cent added.

Mr. MANDERSON. As to these plates, it is not. I will turn to that section.

Mr. COCKRELL. Yes; let us see how that is.

Mr. DAWES. I should like to inquire of the Senator if the bill provides for the sale of more than one copy of the plates?

Mr. MANDERSON. Oh, yes; they may be furnished to as many as may desire them.

Mr. DAWES. Otherwise, if but a single set of plates were sold, then somebody would get a monopoly.

Mr. MANDERSON. The language is "additional or duplicate."

Mr. GALLINGER. Pending the investigation of this matter by the chairman of the committee, I wish to say that probably the purpose of this provision is not to allow the Government Printing Office to be blocked by private work. The purpose of the Government Printing Office is to furnish work for the Departments and for Congress; but if the Public Printer is permitted to go into this work for private individuals on a large scale, the public service might be seriously interfered with and possibly crippled. For that reason it is very desirable that the stereotype plates shall be sold to outside parties to do this kind of work.

Mr. MANDERSON. That is the idea exactly. I simply want to read this for the Senator from Missouri. If he will turn to section 43 he will find that—not exceeding 250 to any one applicant, copies of bills, reports, and documents, said applicants paying in advance the cost of such printing with 10 per cent added.

I think that wording would mean the cost of the composition.

Mr. COCKRELL. And not the material?

Mr. MANDERSON. Yes, the cost of the composition, the paper, the ink, all the material, and all the labor that goes into the document, and 10 per cent more. Then he will notice the proviso that meets the suggestion made by the Senator from New Hampshire:

Provided, That the printing of such work for private parties shall not interfere with the printing for the Government.

Mr. COCKRELL. That has been the law all the time.

Mr. MANDERSON. I beg the Senator's pardon. That is a proviso in the proposed law.

Mr. COCKRELL. I was misled by the committee in their footnote by their saying "this is substantially the present law." I beg pardon for being misled by the Senator.

Mr. MANDERSON. I beg the Senator's pardon. As we are indulging in these courtesies, let me read the footnote:

This is substantially the present law as found in the Supplement to the Revised Statutes, volume 1, second edition, page 311, except that it limits the amount to be printed for any one person, and provides that work for private parties shall not interfere with the printing for the Government,

Mr. PALMER. I should like to ask the Senator from Nebraska whether this section does not allow a monopoly on the part of private printers. The language is:

The Public Printer may sell to any person additional or duplicate stereotype or electrotype plates from which any Government publication was printed, at a price not to exceed the cost of the metal and making to the Government and 10 per cent added.

I understand this is intended to provide that, after the wants of the Government are satisfied, private parties may continue the publication of valuable works. Why limit it, then? Why not allow the stereotype or electrotype plates to be sold to those who will pay the most for them? If the price is thus limited, is it not probable that they will go into the hands of some one who will monopolize them, and thus defeat the very object of the bill? Why not allow them to be disposed of at the best price that can be had, at a minimum to be fixed by law, so that the books may be published by private persons for the public benefit?

Mr. MANDERSON. It seems to me that that proposed change would make the very monopoly which the Senator from Illinois does not desire. The section as it reads permits the sale of any number of plates:

SEC. 53. The Public Printer may sell to any person additional or duplicate stereotype or electrotype plates from which any Government publication was printed, at a price not to exceed the cost of the metal and making to the Government and 10 per cent added:

That opens it to all. A half dozen persons may go in and order the same electrotype plates, as I understand the reading of the section, but if it is put up to some one who shall bid the highest of course he would have a monopoly. The Government could not then sell to the next lowest bidder. It seems to me that the language as it reads protects against the very monopoly which the Senator from Illinois opposes.

Mr. COCKRELL. What would be the difficulty in making duplicate plates? Is there any trouble about that?

Mr. MANDERSON. I do not think there is any trouble about it. I think the electrotype plates can be produced indefinitely.

Mr. CHILTON. I will ask the Senator from Nebraska if he thinks that section clearly states that proposition? It seems to me that it is susceptible of the construction that after the plates are furnished to one party that shall be the limit of the power of the Public Printer.

Mr. MANDERSON. I should not so construe the section, but I should be very glad if the Senator would suggest any language to meet the object he has in view.

Mr. COCKRELL. Insert the words "or persons."

Mr. MANDERSON. I shall not object to that.

Mr. CHILTON. I am inclined to think the Senator from Nebraska is entirely right, but it does not seem perfectly clear that that construction would be upheld.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. In the first line of section 53, after the word "person," insert "or persons;" so as to read:

SEC. 53. The Public Printer may sell to any person or persons additional or duplicate stereotype or electrotype plates from which any Government publication was printed, at a price not to exceed the cost of the metal and making to the Government and 10 per cent added: Provided, That the full amount of the price shall be paid when the order is filed.

The amendment was agreed to

The Chief Clerk read section 54, as follows:

SEC. 54. The Public Printer shall examine closely the orders of the Senate and House for printing, and in case of duplication he shall print under the order first received.

Mr. COCKRELL. What effect will that have where the House and Senate each order a document printed?

Mr. MANDERSON. The House making the first order will receive the printing, and it will not be printed again for the other House. For instance, suppose an executive communication is sent to both Houses, as was the case with the Chilean message of the President; the first order to print happened to come from the House of Representatives. So the Chilean message is a House of Representatives executive document, so marked, and, of course, it would not be duplicated in the Senate.

Mr. COCKRELL. Would each body get the same number as if it had not been ordered by the other?

Mr. MANDERSON. Exactly. There would be the printing of the usual number.

Mr. GALLINGER. I inquire of the chairman of the committee if it might not be well, in the case of duplication, to except bills, as, for instance, a bill printed in the Senate and a similar bill printed in the House?

Mr. MANDERSON. I think not; because a Senate bill and a House bill are entirely different matters, as it seems to me.

The Chief Clerk read section 55 to the end of line 17, as follows:

SEC. 55. Whenever any document or report shall be ordered printed by Congress, such order to print shall signify the "usual number" of copies for binding and distribution among those entitled to receive them. No greater number shall be printed unless ordered by either House or as hereinafter provided. When a special number of a document or report is ordered printed, the usual number shall also be printed, unless already ordered. The usual number of documents and reports shall be 1,682 copies, which shall be distributed as follows:

OF THE HOUSE DOCUMENTS AND REPORTS, UNBOUND.—To the Senate document room, 150 copies; to the office of the Secretary of the Senate, 10 copies; to the House document room, 420 copies; to the Clerk's office of the House, 20 copies.

Mr. COCKRELL. What kind of documents and reports are provided for beginning in line 12? Are they unbound documents? It reads:

To the Senate document room, 150 copies; to the office of the Secretary of the Senate, 10 copies; to the House document room, 420 copies; to the Clerk's office of the House, 20 copies.

Does that refer to the reports of the committees of the House and also to reports from heads of Departments to the House?

Mr. MANDERSON. It does. In other words, it refers to everything that is ordered printed by the House of Representatives, no matter what may be its character, whether it be printed specially by the order of the House or under its general rules. It may be a report of a committee, it may be a communication from one of the executive officers of the Government in response to a House resolution. It may be the regular annual report of a Department chief. Whatever it may be, it comes to the House as a House document, a House report, and under the decision the general words "public document" have been held to include reports.

Before passing further into this matter of the usual number, it perhaps will facilitate the consideration of this subject somewhat if I suggest as to the general number that it has had various changes during the history of the public printing of Congress. For a long time the usual number was 1,550. It was fixed by law. By order of the two Houses that usual number was increased to 1,900, each House increasing the number by order, which practically enlarged the general law. Afterwards the number was changed to 1,734, which became the usual number, and this number has been printed for many years past.

Now, the proposition of the committee is to cut down the usual number to 1,682 copies, and the committee reached that number after taking the testimony of many gentlemen who certainly should be familiar with the necessities of the public service. Reference to the report will show that Mr. Amzi Smith, of the Senate document room, the heads of the libraries, the officers of the Secretary of the Senate, and officers similarly situated in the House of Representatives gave us the benefit of their views upon this subject.

Of this number, 1,734, heretofore printed, there was a division into what is known as the "up-number" and the "reserve number." The "up-number" were the unbound copies. For instance, each report, no matter if it was two or three pages or many pages, became an unbound document, that was distributed in the Senate and House document room and the office of the Secretary of the Senate, etc., for the convenient use of members of Congress and for distribution to a limited degree.

What is known as the "reserve number," which was about one-half of the number printed, was not bound or issued, in fact was not printed usually until about one year after the Congress had adjourned of which these documents were an incident. The result of that was the very difficulty complained of by the Senator from Missouri, that there came to members of Congress large numbers of these reserved documents, ranging from one hundred to two hundred volumes, when the matter was stale, and while perhaps the value in part as matter of reference had no freshness and was not desired.

The proposition now is to take the 1,682 copies, which are known as the usual number of any document ordered printed, and at once print the whole number. A certain number—600 I believe is the footing—remains unbound, and 582 copies are to be bound, and are to be distributed in bound form at once as provided on page 20. The remainder of the documents and reports are to be retained by the Printer in unstitched form, subject to be bound on orders from members of Congress. So, by this changed condition no member who does not desire the reserve documents of Congress need have them, and they remain in unstitched form in the hands of the Public Printer. The amount, as I remember it now, is about 500, which it is supposed will fully meet the demand. If they are not called for, the proposition then is to turn them over to the superintendent of documents for distribution to public libraries.

So, then, what we have done in the way of change from the usual number is a reduction of the number and providing for a better method of distribution of both the bound and unbound copies, and not inflicting the reserve documents upon any member of Congress who does not want them. He can, of course, select from out his quota whatever documents he may particularly desire to have bound, and all the residue go for general distribution to the libraries of the country.

I think that this is one of the most important provisions of this bill, and it has been prepared after very great consideration and considerable investigation by the committee.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, this brings up the whole question in regard to the documents that are left in the document room and those that are distributed directly to Senators, and we may just as well consider the whole provision in discussing it. I see that the remainder of the documents and reports, which would be 1,082, as I understand, shall be reserved by the Public Printer in unstitched form.

Mr. MANDERSON. No. Of those that are bound, 1,082, there shall be distributed, as provided from lines 26 to 38, inclusive, on page 20, which reduces the 1,082 copies, as I remember the figures, to about 500.

Mr. COCKRELL. Well, how can you supply the eighty-eight Senators and three hundred and odd members and the different libraries and so on out of that 500? I suppose the Senator has made the calculation.

Mr. MANDERSON. The libraries are supplied from the 500 copies turned over to the superintendent of documents, which wording the Senator will find in lines 29 and 30.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am going not by the bill the Senator has in his hand, but I am going by the Senator's report.

Mr. MANDERSON. Go by either; they are both the same.

Mr. COCKRELL. They are not numbered alike, and your report does not indicate anything here at all.

Mr. MANDERSON. You mean as to the lines?

Mr. COCKRELL. As to the lines. As to the sections they do.

Mr. MANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. COCKRELL. Now, I want to call attention to that. But we will wait until we get to that particular clause, and we have not reached it yet. There is the same objection to furnishing all the committees of Congress with these copies. There is no sense in that.

The Chief Clerk resumed and continued the reading of section 55, as follows:

OF THE SENATE DOCUMENTS AND REPORTS, UNBOUND.—To the Senate document room, 220 copies; office of Secretary of the Senate, 10 copies; to the House document room, 360 copies; to the Clerk's office of the House, 10 copies.

That of the number printed the Public Printer shall bind 1,082 copies, which shall be distributed as follows:

OF THE HOUSE DOCUMENTS AND REPORTS, BOUND.—To the Senate library, 15 copies; to the Library of Congress, 2 copies, and 50 additional copies for foreign exchanges; to the House library, 15 copies; to the superintendent of documents, 500 copies, for distribution to the State and Territorial libraries and designated depositories.

OF THE SENATE DOCUMENTS AND REPORTS, BOUND.—To the Senate library, 15 copies; to the Library of Congress, 2 copies, and 50 copies additional for foreign exchanges; to House library, 15 copies; to the superintendent of documents, 500 copies, for distribution to State and Territorial libraries and designated depositories. These documents shall be bound in half Russia.

The remainder of said documents and reports shall be reserved by the Public Printer in unstitched form, and shall be held subject to be bound in the number provided by law, upon orders from the Vice-President, Senators, Representatives, Delegates, Secretary of the Senate, Clerk of the House, and chairmen of committees, in such binding as they shall select, except full morocco or calf; and those selected by chairmen of committees to be bound for use of the committees shall be lettered on the back to show to what committee they belong. All of the "usual number" shall be printed at one time.

Mr. MANDERSON. Now let me call attention to the fact that it is not proposed, as has heretofore been done, to give these reserve documents to every member of Congress. They are retained in unstitched form subject to his order, if he sees fit to have them or any part of them. Nor is it proposed to send them to committees, whether the older committees of the two Houses or all the committees; but they are there subject to the order of the chairman of the committee if he sees fit to order them.

I am not tenacious of the proposition that committees, as such or through their chairmen, should have any of these documents, and it certainly would suit me very well, and I think suit the committee, if the Senator would move to strike out all reference to the chairmen of committees.

Mr. COCKRELL. It is only a question of time when every document room would be filled, and there would not be space enough for a Senator to get inside of a room if all these things are to be sent here. I shall move that amendment.

Mr. MANDERSON. I think so myself. That can be reached by striking out "and chairmen of committees" in line 44.

Mr. COCKRELL. And inserting after the words "Secretary of the Senate," and before the words "Clerk of the House," the word "and," and then by striking out the words "and chairmen of committees."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 55, line 43, after the word "Senate," it is proposed to insert the word "and;" and after the word "House," at the end of line 43, to strike out "and chairmen of committees;" so as to read:

Senators, Representatives, Delegates, Secretary of the Senate, and Clerk of the House, in such binding as they shall select, except full morocco or calf, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. Then strike out all after the word "calf" to the end of that line, and make the semicolon after the word "calf" a period.

Mr. MANDERSON. Strike out down to the next period.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out, after the word "calf," in line 45, the following words:

And those selected by chairmen of committees to be bound for use of the committees shall be lettered on the back to show to what committee they belong.

Mr. MANDERSON. Leaving the rest of the section to stand.

Mr. COCKRELL. Yes. That, as I understand, will allow the chairmen of committees to have the reports of their own committeees bound just as they have been doing, and that is all that any committee ought to have.

Mr. MANDERSON. I agree to that.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL].

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary read section 56.

Section 57 was read, as follows:

SEC. 57. There shall be printed in slip form 1,810 copies of public and 460 of private laws, postal conventions, and treaties, which shall be distributed as follows: To the House document room, 1,000 copies of public and 100 copies of private laws; to the Senate document room, 550 copies of public and 100 copies of private laws; to the Department of State, 200 copies of all laws; and to the Treasury Department, 60 of all laws. Postal conventions and treaties shall be distributed as private laws.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, I should like to ask the chairman of the committee if any inquiry was made of the superintendents of the respective document rooms in regard to the laws which are printed in slip form?

Mr. MANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have very, very often had occasion to send them out. I remember the law about land in severalty to Indians, the Indian depredation-claims law, and various other laws, for which I had a great many applications, and I sent them out. I do not know whether this was the number that the superintendent of the document room supposed would be sufficient to meet that demand or not.

Mr. MANDERSON. The Senator will find full information on that subject in the testimony of Amzi Smith, on page 46.

The CHAIRMAN. I see that the number of slip laws printed is 1,810, of which 1,000 go to the House document room, 550 to the Senate document room, 200 to the Department of State, and 60 to the Treasury Department.

Mr. SMITH. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What suggestions, if any, have you to make concerning this number? Can it be reduced?

Mr. SMITH. The State Department makes a division of the laws, making a distinction between public and private laws. Of the private laws, so far as the Senate document room is concerned, at least 300 or 350 could be dispensed with without detriment to the public service. Of the public laws, some of them, of course, could be dispensed with; but it is utterly impossible to tell in advance which ones.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you think it would be desirable legislation that would make a distinction between public and private laws?

Mr. SMITH. Most decidedly.

The CHAIRMAN. Printing, perhaps, one-third as many private laws as of public laws?

Mr. SMITH. One-third would be amply sufficient, so far as the demands on the Senate document room are concerned.

The CHAIRMAN. The laws that are printed on common paper, in what you call slip form, are simply to satisfy a temporary demand that occurs between the time that the law is passed and the issuance of the session laws.

Mr. SMITH. Yes, sir. We keep a permanent file of the slip laws, so that if a person wants a copy of a given law, even back as far as 1866 or 1867, we can furnish it in most instances.

I will not take the time to read further from his testimony as to this practice.

Mr. COCKRELL. What have you done about the public laws? Do you leave the number unchanged?

Mr. MANDERSON. My recollection is that there is a small decrease. There is a very large decrease of the private laws.

Mr. COCKRELL. I mean the public laws.

Mr. MANDERSON. The public laws are left the same. I wish to state right there that this is another of the numerous economies of this bill in dispensing with the printing of unnecessary matter.

The Secretary read section 58, as follows:

SEC. 58. There shall be printed of the Journals of the Senate and House of Representatives 1,110 copies, which shall be distributed as follows: To the Senate document room, 90 copies for distribution to Senators, and 25 additional copies; to the Senate library, 15 copies; to the House document room, 360 copies for distribution to members, and 25 additional copies; to the Department of State, 10 copies; to the superintendent of documents, 500 copies; to the Library of Congress, 52 copies; to the Court of Claims, 2 copies, and to the library of the House of Representatives, 10 copies. The remaining number of the Journals of the Senate and House of Representatives, consisting of 21 copies, shall be furnished to the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives, respectively, as the necessities of their respective offices may require, as rapidly as signatures are completed for such distribution.

Mr. MANDERSON. Mr. President, I desire to call particular attention to the note to section 58, because here is a very great saving in the printing of copies of the Journals.

In 1888, largely because of the vigorous and strenuous efforts made by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL], there was a law passed which reduced the number of copies of the Journals published by the Senate and House of Representatives very materially. It was ascertained that by some strange slip in legislation years ago there was a printing of 1,500 copies of the Journal, which were entirely unnecessary and that no one really supposed were being printed. They were accumulating to the disturbance of everybody. This is further legislation in the way of making radical reductions in the number of copies of the Journals printed.

The Secretary read section 59, as follows:

SEC. 59. Whatever printing not bearing a Congressional number shall be done for any Department or officer of the Government, except confidential matter, blank forms, and circular letters not of a public character or for use of Congressional committees, not of a confidential character, 2 copies shall be sent, unless withheld by order of the committee, by the Public Printer to the Senate and House libraries, respectively, and 1 copy each to the document rooms of the Senate and House, for reference; and these copies shall not be removed.

Mr. MANDERSON. I offer an amendment to this section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BERRY in the chair). The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 59, line 4, after the word "or," it is proposed to insert the words "shall be done."

Mr. MANDERSON. That is simply to make the language, which seems a little ambiguous, more certain.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be considered as agreed to in the absence of objection.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let us hear it read in connection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The section will be read as proposed to be amended.

The Secretary read as follows:

SEC. 59. Whenever printing not bearing a Congressional number shall be done for any Department or officer of the Government, except confidential matter, blank forms, and circular letters not of a public character, or shall be done for use of Congressional committees, etc.

Mr. MANDERSON. That is simply to require that 2 copies shall be sent to the Senate and House libraries, so that there may be preserved the printing that is done for committees, which generally disappears out of sight and can not be found after a year or two.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANDERSON. I offer an amendment to come in at the end of the section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 25, it is proposed to add at the end of section 59 the following:

And of all publications of the Executive Departments made for distribution, 500 copies shall be at once delivered to the superintendent of documents for distribution to designated depositaries and State and Territorial libraries.

Mr. MANDERSON. This is to meet a consideration suggested by many of the public libraries of the country. The public libraries of the United States have an organization made up of the librarians, and this organization has officers, a president, I believe, a secretary, etc., and an executive committee made up of some of the most distinguished of the learned men who are in that occupation. They are very desirous that these public libraries should receive more of the Government publications, and an underlying principle in this bill is to give more of the public documents to the libraries of the country. We not only give all Government publications heretofore given to the designated depositories and to State and Territorial libraries, which takes 496 copies, I think, of every public document, but we add to those the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, the Session Laws, and the Statutes at Large.

There have been petitions in very large quantities received during the years past asking that these documents shall be added to the documents that shall be issued to designated depositories. Of late the demand has been for the publications from the different Executive Departments; for instance, professional papers issued by some of the chiefs of bureaus, monographs, letters of information I believe they are called, issued by the Navy Department.

Mr. COCKRELL. And by the War Department.

Mr. MANDERSON. And the War Department. There is a great anxiety on the part of these libraries to obtain these publications. It has seemed to the committee that it would be no more than just and right that of the number of these documents printed on the requisition of the heads of Departments 500 should be delivered to the superintendent of documents for him to distribute as he distributes all other Government publications.

I have here a number of letters from librarians suggesting this idea—one handed to me but yesterday by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE]. It is to meet that view that this amendment is inserted.

Mr. COCKRELL. I think the amendment is perfectly just and proper. These documents ought to be sent out to these libraries. A great many of them are very valuable documents. They are not of the transient current business of the country that must be read at the time to be appreciated, but they are valuable for all time to come, and especially they should go to all the libraries. I think it is economy to increase the number of such recipients of documents if it does increase the number printed. It will necessarily increase the number, I suppose.

Mr. MANDERSON. That will be within the discretion of the bureau chief who orders the printing. I do not think it would necessarily increase the number, because he would desire, of course, that these documents should go to the libraries, and, perhaps, under the method of distribution in some of the Departments they have been sent to these designated depositories.

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not think they have ever been sent to the designated depositories of public documents.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANDERSON. I ask leave to insert in the RECORD, in connection with the last amendment proposed, a letter from Mr. Fletcher, the librarian of Amherst College library, at Amherst, Mass., addressed to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES], and a letter from the very efficient librarian of the public library at Omaha, Nebr., in which they call attention to the character of this amendment and the bill generally.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The papers referred to will be printed in the RECORD in the absence of objection.

The letters are as follows:

AMHERST COLLEGE LIBRARY,
Amherst, Mass., January 28, 1892.

DEAR SIR: The bill prepared by the joint committee of Congress for the regulation of the Government printing and distribution of documents has been reported in the Senate (Senate bill 1549) and also in the House, as I am informed, but I have not learned the number of the House bill. This bill provides for some of the reforms desired by librarians, such as periodical indexes, new style of lettering on binding, appointment of superintendent of documents with general supervision of distribution, and some other minor matters, but it does not make any provision for placing in the State and Territorial libraries the documents which they do not now receive.

The most important of these are the publications of the various Executive Departments, known as Professional Papers, bulletins, monographs, circulars of information, etc., which include the researches of the scientists in the employ of the Government, and are of more real value to the general public than the mass of documents regularly distributed. It is hardly necessary to say that all of these documents printed at public expense should be placed in the designated depositories in order that the public may have access to them. This can easily be provided for by an amendment to section 59 of this bill, which covers this class of documents, requiring that 500 copies of such documents be delivered to the superintendent of documents for distribution to the depositories.

If such an amendment can be incorporated in the bill it will be a great improvement from my point of view as librarian of one of the "designated depositories." But as it is, the bill goes so far in the direction of the reforms needed that, if the suggested amendment can not be made, I should earnestly hope for its passage in its present form, as I think it will be recognized as making a great improvement over the present system, or rather systemless method, of distributing the Government publications.

Very respectfully,

WILLIAM I. FLETCHER, Librarian.

Hon. HENRY L. DAWES,
United States Senator.

PUBLIC LIBRARY, Omaha, Nebr., January 27, 1892.

DEAR GENERAL MANDERSON: The bill prepared by the joint committee of Congress for the regulation of the Government printing and distribution of documents, while providing many reforms, does not, as I understand, make any provision for the distribution to libraries of monographs, bulletins, circulars of information, and the publications of the executive documents known as Professional Papers.

Is it not desirable that these important documents reach the public through the libraries? The information is usually the most reliable, and, more, the most up to date. The libraries are constantly receiving, and necessarily refusing, requests for these documents. The matter is preserved for future use and reaches many who now are obliged to do without or to depend on what information is reprinted in the newspapers.

Trusting you will pardon any presumption in my suggestions, I am

Very respectfully, yours,

JESSIE ALLAN, Librarian.

Hon. C. F. MANDERSON, M C.,
Washington, D. C.

The Secretary read section 60.

Section 61 was read, as follows:

SEC. 61. There shall be one document room of the Senate and one of the House of Representatives, to be designated, respectively, the "Senate and the House document room." Each shall be in charge of a superintendent, who shall be appointed by the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate and the Doorkeeper of the House, respectively, who shall also appoint the necessary number of assistants.

Mr. MANDERSON. Mr. President, this section changes an existing condition. There is in the Senate one document room, under the charge, as we all know, of Mr. Amzi Smith. But for a very long time there have been connected with the House of Representatives two document rooms, one known as the House document room and the other as the Clerk's document room. Upon making an investigation there seemed to be a uniformity of opinion that one of these document rooms could, with great advantage to the public service, be dispensed with; that it was not only desirable as a matter of economy, but that as a matter of better system in the distribution of books it would be proper. Members of the committee, however, who were of the Senate would not have made this change had it not been desired by the member of the House committee who was present.

I make this statement here, because there has been, I understand, some criticism upon the effort to curtail what might be called the privileges of one of the Houses of Congress. It of course is entirely within the power of the House of Representatives to maintain its present system of document rooms if it desires; but, as I say, the uniform testimony was, even of those prominently connected with document rooms themselves, that it would be desirable to have but one document room for each House.

Mr. COCKRELL. I understand there was a member of the House who was a member of the committee by joint resolution, and this is the arrangement that he suggested?

Mr. MANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. COCKRELL. So that it comes from that body?

Mr. MANDERSON. From that body. I want to state here, what perhaps may not be understood, that this bill is the product of a special committee authorized by concurrent resolution passed at the last Congress, that special committee being composed of the Senate Committee on Printing and Messrs. RICHARDSON and RUSSELL, who were appointed by the Speaker of the House as the House members of the committee, Messrs. RICHARDSON and RUSSELL having been members of the Committee on Printing at the last session of Congress, and, being so, were detailed for this work, because it was presumed they would probably be members of the Committee on Printing of this Congress, and in fact Mr. RICHARDSON is now the chairman of that committee.

Section 62 was read, as follows:

SEC. 62. The President of the United States shall nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint a superintendent of documents, who shall receive a salary of $3,000 per annum. He shall have general supervision of the distribution of all public documents, and to his custody shall be committed all documents subject to distribution, excepting those printed for the use of the two Houses of Congress, which are to be distributed on the order of Members and Delegates, or are for the special official use of the Executive Departments.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I move to strike out that section. I do not see any necessity for the creation of this office. I should like to state that I object specifically to the powers that are given by the succeeding section. I inquire of the chairman of the committee having charge of this bill what would be the effect of striking out this section? Where would it leave the distribution of these documents under the bill?

Mr. MANDERSON. I fear it would leave them in a very chaotic condition, and I think the Senator from Missouri, when he has fully considered this matter, will hardly insist upon that motion to strike out.

There was no proposition that was more embarrassing to the committee that had this matter under consideration than that which involved the distribution of the public documents. We were met with a condition that has been frequently described. Here was this vast collection in the Departments and in the Capitol running into many hundreds of thousands of practically abandoned volumes of public documents. They seemed to be without ownership. I would not be surprised to know that in the Departments and in and about the Capitol and different storehouses there is a million of books waiting for some one to take charge of them and distribute them throughout the country. The folding rooms of the two Houses are charged with the duty of the distribution of the special printing of Congress, the quotas that are assigned to the members of the two Houses. It hardly seemed to us that we could throw upon these folding rooms this matter of the distribution of this vast collection of documents that were constantly accumulating. No one realizes until he has looked into this matter what this accumulation of public documents means.

Congress provides by concurrent resolution for the printing of a number of a publication, say 2,000 copies for the Senate and 4,000 for the House of Representatives. When this amount comes to be divided in each case by the number of members of the body it is found that there is a remainder over in every instance. Now, I confess it was a matter of very great surprise to me when I ascertained, upon investigation of the fact, that at one Congress this accumulation of remainders amounted to 40,000 volumes, for which there was really no practical ownership. They belonged to the Senate or belonged to the House of Representatives, but in each instance there were so few of them that there were not enough to give one apiece to the different members. Here was this vast accumulation of material. The question was, what should be done with it and what should be done with the accumulation that would come from the annual house-cleaning of the Departments and of the Capitol proposed by this bill?

We found in the Interior Department an officer created by act of Congress some years ago, known as the superintendent of documents. We found that it was his duty under the law to send out to the designated depositories, designated by members of Congress, and to State and Territorial libraries the books that they were entitled to. We found that he had been doing most excellent work. He had, as far as his power extended, prevented the duplication of documents, and no one can understand how great that evil has been until investigation is had. For instance, we found that by orders from members of the House of Representatives one man had received forty volumes of the same publication; and I have no question but that speculative gentlemen make a profit by writing to members of Congress of either House and obtaining many copies of the same book. We found that Dr. Ames, this efficient officer, has done a great deal towards preventing that sort of duplication of the documents intrusted to him.

We thought it was infinitely better that this official should be placed where the Public Printer is placed, under the hand of Congress, to be its creature, rather than the creature of any of the Executive Departments of the Government. This bill is framed on the idea that under his general direction, and without encroachment upon the privilege of any member of either House of Congress, but as a substantial benefit and aid to them in the distribution of the public literature, this office could be created with profit. Now, it may be that some of the powers and duties that devolve upon him can be changed with benefit, and I have one or two changes that I propose to make in the parts of the bill that define the duties of the superintendent of documents. I think they will commend themselves to the Senate, and particularly to the Senator from Missouri.

The Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] came to me this morning, feeling that this official was to be given too great powers, and I called his attention to one or two changes that I proposed to make in the bill, that caused him, I think, to be very well content with the establishment of this office.

It is not really the creation of a new office, it is not the establishment of another bureau. It will not add a dollar of expense, but I think will be a very great saving of expense to the Government. We simply take the superintendent of documents out of the Interior Department and place him here, and it seems to me that here is where he belongs. The matter that is printed, except the material that is printed on the requisition of the Executive Departments, is Congressional printing. The Printer is the Congressional Printer. True, his name has been changed to that of Public Printer, but none the less he has always been considered, is considered to-day, and I think always will be, as the creation of Congress, subject to its immediate direction, without interference by any of the executive officers of the Government, and I think the superintendent of documents should be of the same class of officials, that he should be brought here, and be under our direction. I think if we do that we can build up here a symmetrical and well-organized method of distribution and we shall bring order out of the present chaos.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I endeavor always to discuss public business very frankly, and I wish to say now that I am not an enemy of this bill. As the Senator from Nebraska knows, I have been endeavoring for some years in my feeble way to right the abuses in regard to this, to cleanse the Augean stables in connection with the public printing. I am heartily in sympathy with any reform, because it can not be made much worse than it is now. That is certain. But during my service here I have known personally, as has every other Senator who was here at the time, instances of the grossest abuse in regard to public documents by officials of each House of Congress. I had occasion once during a Presidental canvass to call the attention of the Senate by resolution to a case where one of our emyloyés had used his privileges to issue a campaign document on the tariff question, upon which he had placed his name as an officer of the Senate, and to which he gave official sanction, and that was sent throughout the country.

Nothing has been more common than to take a campaign document and inject it into a speech of a Senator or a member of the House of Representatives, so that it could be used for distribution under the franking privilege; and even now there is a bureau in this Government, as I shall undertake to show in a very few days, that is using its power to distribute political documents ostensibly for the purpose of informing people with regard to certain matters that are going on. I am not willing to give to any officer the power to handle my list of documents for distribution. I do not say this because we are now under a Republican Administration, for I would deny it to a Democrat, and it is just as much subject to abuse under one party as another. We can not be too particular, we can not scrutinize too closely in regard to the powers given to an official occupying the delicate relation to members of Congress that this superintendent will under this proposed law.

As I said a few moments ago, the subsequent provisions of this bill constitute to me the most serious objection. In the first place, look at section 62, which is under consideration:

SEC. 62. The President of the United States shall nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint a superintendent of documents, who shall receive a salary of $3,000 per annum. He shall have general supervision of the distribution of all public documents, and to his custody shall be committed all documents subject to distribution, excepting those printed for the use of the two Houses of Congress, which are to be distributed on the order of Members and Delegates, or are for the special official use of the Executive Departments.

Mr. MANDERSON. Mr. President, if I may interrupt the Senator, strange as it may seem, that is the existing law with reference to this official, practically.

Mr. VEST. The list is not placed in the hands of the general superintendent.

Mr. MANDERSON. The superintendent of documents is the only distributing power, except where the distribution comes from the different Departments of their peculiar publications.

Mr. VEST. But it is not exercised, and we all know it. There is no general superintendent now to whom I must send my list of documents for distribution. That is the point I am making.

Mr. MANDERSON. But the Senator, it seems to me, hardly reads the section with the same understanding at least that I do. There is thrown upon the superintendent a general supervision of the distribution of all public documents, and to his custody go the documents subject to distribution, which are those he now receives, excepting those printed for the use of the two Houses of Congress.

Mr. VEST. Exactly.

Mr. MANDERSON. No member's quota of documents goes to the superintendent of documents.

Mr. VEST. I understand that.

Mr. MANDERSON. But it will go to the folding room, as it does now.

Mr. VEST. Exactly, but he has to have that list. That is the point I am making. I do not care about who has the actual corporeal possession. The point I make is that he is furnished with a list of documents which every Member and Senator sends out.

Mr. MANDERSON. If the Senator will permit another interruption, here is an amendment which I propose to add to line 22 of this section, which I think meets that difficulty, and I make this interruption and suggest these changes because, if it is possible to do so, I desire to convert the Senator to the idea that he should not move to strike out this section that creates this official.

Mr. VEST. Very good; I will withdraw my motion until I hear the Senator, because I am not an enemy of the bill.

Mr. MANDERSON. I propose to add to this amendment at the end of line 22:

And provided further, That any portion of the quota of documents of any Senator, Representative, or Delegate shall be delivered to himself whenever order to this effect is given to the superintendent of documents.

That takes every book that is of the quota of a member of Congress completely out from the control of the superintendent, and puts it within the control of the member. If that language does not do it, let us insert language that will do it if it is desirable.

So far as I am concerned, for every document that I distribute my list is open to the world. I do not care where or by whom it may be published. I try to make a distribution of public documents of which I am not ashamed, and I do not fear that any political adversary can make capital by an inspection of the list of those to whom I send Government publications, and I do not understand either that a majority of the Government publications are those of which political use can be made. If that is so, we had better stop publishing a great many of them.

My idea was that they were for the purpose of informing the people, of giving information to those interested in different pursuits that would be of advantage to them, to show the results of scientific explorations, of experiments of scientists, etc. That certainly is not political in its character. But I do not desire that my particular wish in that matter shall prevail. As I say, I do not care who sees my list, but perhaps other Senators or members of the House of Representatives may, and if so, the opportunity is given them by this amendment that neither this superintendent of documents nor any other man shall be permitted to see the list of those to whom they send Government publications.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, it is hardly necessary for us to say what we would be willing to do in regard to our list of documents. I think I can stand here with all safety and say I have just as few reasons for concealing any public act of mine as the Senator from Nebraska or any other Senator.

Mr. MANDERSON. Undoubtedly.

Mr. VEST. That is not the question. There is no use for us to conceal the fact that in close and heated political contests men will resort to almost any measure, and think it absolutely and morally right, to achieve political success. All of us remember in the last Presidential canvass that the Voice published a charge—and I have never heard a denial of it—that men were sent into their office from the outside and procured their whole list of subscribers for the national campaign committee of the Republican party. The result was that documents were sent from those headquarters to all the subscribers to the Voice, intended to turn the whole Prohibition vote of the country in a certain direction. All this was notorious and as well known as the names of Senators here to-day.

I assert now, and I can prove it—and it has never been denied, for that matter—that officers of this Senate in the last canvass distributed campaign documents, made official by putting their names upon them, and the resolution is here which I myself offered calling attention to it, and the fact has never been disputed. On the contrary, Republican Senators stood here and justified it and said they had a right to do it.

Suppose I am in a close Congressional district where 10 or 20 or 100 votes will decide the representation from that district. I am sending my documents, a speech, for instance, that I have made upon the salient issues in that canvass, to certain persons, generally perhaps to doubtful voters.

Mr. MANDERSON. That would not be a public document within the meaning of the law.
